Sir T. Brown, Garden of Cyrus, iii.

3. The act of beating a metal into a thin plate, leaf, or foil. — 4. The act or operation of spreading foil over the surface of a piece of glass to form a mirror. — 5. The state of being foliaceous or foliated. — 6. In geol., an arrangement of the constituent minerals of a rock in thinly lamellar or often scale-like forms, the result of which is that the mass splits easily in a certain definite direction. Foliation may be congenital with the formation of the rock itself, or posterior to it; in the latter case the epithet foliated indicates a structure not essentially different from that more generally designated as schistose. The relations of foliation to cleavage are somewhat obscure. The essential difference between them appears to be that cleavage is rarely well developed except in the grained, argillaceous rock, which by its effects is usually rendered capable of almost indefinite subdivision in one direction, while foliation separates the rock into bands sometimes quite distinct from each other in mineral character, these bands being also not infrequently more or less irregular in thickness and rather lenticular in form.

By some geologists it is thought that in foliation a more advanced stage of metamorphism has been reached than that indicated by cleavage; but it is also highly probable that the original lithological and structural character of the mass had much to do with bringing about the observed differences. See schist and schistose.

7. In arch., enrichment with ornamental cusps or groups of cusps, as in the tracery of mediaeval windows; foils collectively; feathering. — 8. Arrangement by leaves; specifically, a numbering of the leaves of a book instead of the pages.

Pagination or rather foliation was first used by Arist. Ther. Boemen, at Cologne in 1471, in Adrianus's Libro de Remedia Fortitudinis Cæsum, having each leaf (not page) numbered by figures placed in the end of the line on the middle of each right-hand page.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 487.

The confes are but a foolish folk. Prov. xxx. 26.

Some of the words the wren spoken between two folks, that on was of Jerusalem, and that other of Babylon.

Old Eng. Homilies (ed. Morris), II. 51.

But, if we [English-speaking people] do not belong to the same nation, I do hold that we belong to the same people; or rather, to use a word of our own tongue, to the same folk. By that I mean that we come of the same stock, that we speak the same tongue, that we have a long common history and a crowd of common memories.

R. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 14.

(e) pl. Friends: as, we are not folks now. [Prov. Eng.] — Good folk. See good. One's folks, or the folks, one's people; one's family or relatives; as, he has gone to see his folks, how are the folks at home? [Colloq.]

Folkething (fōk-ke-ting), n. [Dan., < folk, folk (= L. volk), + thing, a meeting (of lawmakers); see Landthing.] The lower house of the Danish parliament or Rigsdag. It consists of 112 members elected for three years by all male citizens 20 years of age and over. All matters regarding the budget and taxation must first be introduced into the Folkething and discussed by it before being taken up by the Landthing or upper house. Wharton.

folk-frith (fōk-frith), n. In Anglo-Saxon law, the rightful power of the whole people. Men having a controversy with each other were not allowed to settle it by violence without first obtaining leave of the people on showing sufficient cause. To fight without leave was a breach of the folk frith.

The conquerors came as "folks"; and the very existence of a folk implied a "folk frith" of the community as a whole.

J. R. Green, Comp. of Eng., p. 51.

folkland (fōk-land), n. [A mod. form, repr. AS. folcland, < folc, the people, + land, land.] In old Eng. law, the land of the folk or people, as distinguished from bookland, which was held by charter or deed. It comprised the whole area that was not assigned to individuals or communities at the original allotment, and that was not subsequently divided into estates of bookland. (Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 26.) It corresponded to the ager publicus of the Romans.

The folkland, the common land of the community or of the nation, out of which the ancient allodial possessions were carved.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, I. 42.

Portions of the folkland might be, and frequently were, turned into private property by grant from the sovereign power; or, without altering the ultimate public property in the land, the possession and enjoyment of it might be, and constantly were, let out to individuals.

E. Pollack, Land Laws, p. 80.

folk-lore (fōk-lōr), n. [folk + lore; first suggested by Mr. Thoms in 1846 ("Athenæum," 1846, p. 802), in imitation of G. compounds like collected, folk-song, folk-keeping, popular, epis., etc.] The lore of the common people; the traditional beliefs and customs of the people, especially such as are obsolete or archaic; traditional knowledge; popular superstitions, tales, traditions, or legends.

Among the proofs of his [William John Thoms's] happiness of hitting on names may be cited his . . . invention of the word folk-lore. N. and Q., 4th ser., XII. 141.

Mr. Gomme offers as a definition of the science of folk-lore the following: It is "the comparison and identification of the survivals, archaic beliefs, customs, and traditions in modern ages."

Science, IX. 479.

folkloric (fōk-lōr-ik), a. [folk-lore + -ic.] Of or pertaining to folk-lore. [Recent.]

Nature, XXXIV. 20.

folklorist (fōk-lōr-ist), n. [folk-lore + -ist.] One skilled in or engaged in the study of folk-lore. [Recent.]

The question whether the personality of the giant Gargantua is an emanation of the fertile genius of Rabelais, or whether that writer grafted his own immortal ideas on to an ancient Celtic stock has for some time past been a matter of friendly dispute amongst French folklorists.

N. and Q., 7th ser., I. 404.

folkloristic (fōk-lōr-ist-ik), a. [folk-lore + -istic.] Pertaining to the field of the folklorist; of the nature of folk-lore. [Recent.]

A recent visit to the Mithrasgrube of Neugers Island (a remnant of a once powerful branch of the great Offawa confederacy) has enabled us to collect some interesting philological and folkloristic information.

Science, XII. 132.

folk-moot (fok'mōt), n. [A mod. form, repr. ME. folk-mote*, AS. folc-gemōt (= Dan. folkmøde = Sw. folk-mote), < folc, the people, + gemōt, a meeting; see folk and moot. The form folk-mote is also used archaically in mod. law writings; histories, etc.; it scarcely occurs in ME. literature.] 1. Formerly, in England, an assembly of the shire, containing representatives from townships and hundreds; also, a local court.

2. To which folke mote they all with one consent . . . Agreed to travel and the in fortunes try.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, iv, 6.

Four representative burghers attend like the four men and the reeve in the ancient folk-moots, and on behalf of their neighbours transact the business of the day.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 422.

2. A place where assemblies of the people were held. [Rare.]

These round hills and square bawnes, which ye see now strongly trenched and thrown up, were (they say) at first ordaind for the same purpose, that people might assemble thereon, and therefore anciently they were called Folk-motes; that is, a place for people to meet or talk of any thing that concerned any difference between parishes and townships.

Spenser, Statute of Ireland.

folk-mooter (fok'mō-tōr), n. [A mod. form, repr. ME. folk-moter*, AS. folc-mōter, < folc, the people, + mōter, right, law.] A frequenter of folk-moots or popular meetings; a democrat.

Keep your problems of ten groats; these matters are not for pragmatists and folk-mooters to babble in.

Milton, Colasterion.

Bacon, Fable of Persius.

The famine . . . shall follow close after you.

Jer. xlii, 16.

2. To result as an effect from a cause or an inference from premises; be a consequent; as, from such conduct great scandal is sure to follow: the facts may be admitted, but the inference drawn from them does not follow.

This above all—to thine own self be true; And it must follow, as the night the day, Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Shak., Hamlet, I, 2.

In a short time it followed, that could not be had for a pound of Copper which before was sold for an ounce.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I, 108.

If he suspects me without cause, I follow that the best way of curing his jealousy is to give him reason for 't.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv, 2.

=Syn. Follow, Succeed, Enue. Follow and succeed, or succeed to, are applied to persons or things; enue, in modern literature, to things only. Follow may denote the mere going in order in a track or line, and it commonly suggests that the things mentioned are near together. Succeed (transitive or intransitive), implying a regular series, denotes the being in the same place which another has held immediately before; a crowd may follow a man, but only one person or event can succeed to another; upon the death of a sovereign his oldest son succeeds him and succeeds to the throne; day follows night. To ensue is to follow close upon, to follow as the effect of some settled principle of order, to follow by a necessary connection; as, nothing but suffering can ensue from such a course.

I yield, I follow where heaven shows the way.

Dryden.

(One sorrow never comes, but brings an heir, That may succeed as his inheritor.

Shak., Pericles, I, 4.

Then grave (Clarissa graceful) waid her fan; Silence caus'd, and thus the nymph began.

1. A repository for the water used in baptism; now, specifically, a basin, usually of marble or other fine stone, permanently fixed within a church, to contain the water for baptism by sprinkling or immersion; distinctively called a baptismal font. Ritually, its proper position is near the entrance of the church, but it is very commonly placed near the chancel. In the early ages of the church the font was placed in a separate building or chapel called the baptistery; and this usage has maintained itself in some regions, notably in Italy. By the eleventh century it had become customary to locate the font within the main church edifice. The earliest medieval fonts were of considerable size, as it was then the practice to administer the rite by immersion. They were usually of massive stone or marble, and even the oldest surviving examples are, as a rule, richly sculptured. See baptistery.

1. In man and other vertebrate animals, the terminal part of the leg, upon which the body rests in standing; one of the pedal extremities.

Thou makes the for to kyss His mouthe by deuocione and knately prayers, but thou treadis apoun his foet and defoules thame. Hampole, Prose Treatises (J. E. T. S.), p. 28.

If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 1 Cor. xii 15.

Many a light foot alone like a jewel set In the dark crag. Tennyson, Princess, III.

In man the foot are the terminal segments of the posterior limbs, corresponding to the hands of the anterior extremities, and extending from the ankle-joint or tibio-tarsal articulation to the end of the toes. The foot is divided into three parts, the tarsus or ankle, the metatarsals or instep, and the phalanges, digits, or toes. It contains 26 bones: namely, 7 tarsals, the astragalus, calcaneum, scaphoid, cuboid, and 3 cuneiform bones; 5 metatarsals; and 14 phalanges, 3 to each of the digits except the great toe, which has 2. The axis of the foot is at right angles with that of the leg, and the whole sole rests upon the ground. The principal muscles acting upon the foot are the anterior and posterior tibial, the three peroneal, the gastrocnemius and soleus, and the flexors and extensors of the toes. In many mammals the structure of the foot is much the same as in man, especially in those which are plantigrade; but the term is extended usually to the corresponding segment of the fore limb. In digitigrade mammals which walk upon the toes, as cats and dogs, or upon the ends of the toes, as in hoofed quadrupeds, the foot, properly speaking, extends up the limb; thus, in the horse, for example, the feet reach up to the hock of the hind limb and the so-called knee of the fore limb (see cut under peroneus), but in popular language foot is restricted to the phalangeal part of the foot, which rests on the ground in walking. In birds the foot is properly the whole of the hind limb up to the tibio-tarsal joint, commonly but wrongly called the knee, and includes the osseous tarsus and toes; it is popularly restricted to the toes alone. In reptiles and batrachians which have limbs the foot is the terminal segment of either fore or hind limb as in other vertebrates. The hind foot is technically called the pes.

2. In invertebrate animals, some part serving the purpose of a foot. (a) In mollusks any surface or part of the body upon which the animal rests or moves. It is often extensive or protuberant as in gastropods, and is technically called the ped and pedicel under Helicidae and Lamellibranchiata. (b) In insects, especially the tarsus. (c) In arthropods, the leg. The modifications of the limbs have different names as seen under phalange, ambulatory leg, etc. (d) In worms, one of the bristly appendages called parapodia. See cut under parapodium. (e) In echinoderms, a tubular prolongation of the body through an ambulacrum. See tube foot. (f) In protozoa, a temporary prolongation of the body, called a false foot. See pseudopodium.

3. Milit., soldiers who march and fight on foot; infantry as distinguished from cavalry; used collectively for foot-soldiers, as, a regiment of foot; the Tenth (regiment of) foot.

Part wield their arms, part curb the foaming steed, Single or in array of battle ranged. Both horse and foot, not idly mustering stood. Milton, P. L., xi, 646.

nouncing a syllable is almost entirely disregarded. In the poetry of the Greeks, Romans, Hindus, and other nations in whose languages the syllable accent was chiefly a matter of tone or pitch, quantity—that is, the length of time taken in pronouncing each syllable—determined the rhythm. In Greek and Roman rhythms and metrics a unit of time is assumed, called a primary or fundamental time or mora, or specifically a time, and this is regarded as the ordinary or normal short (marked \cup), and expressed in verbal composition by a short syllable. The ordinary or normal long (marked —) is equal to two times or more, and is expressed by a long syllable. Metrical classification of such feet is based either on metrical magnitude—that is, on the length of the foot as measured in mora or times, each long being reckoned as two shorts—or on the pedal ratio—that is, the proportion of the number of times in the thesis to that in the arsis.

From long to long in solemn sort Slow Spondee stalks, strong foot yet ill able Ever to come up with Dactyl triavliable.
Coleridge, Metrical Foot.

12. In music: (a) A drone-bass. (b) A chorus or refrain; a burden. (c) In organ-building: (1) The part of a pipe below its mouth. (2) A measure or name used in denoting the pitch of stops. The standard of reference is the length of an open pipe belonging to the second C below middle C. A unison stop is called an 8 foot stop, because in this case the pipe is about 8 feet long. Similarly, an octave stop is called a 4 foot stop; a double or suboctave stop, a 16 foot stop, etc. (See stop.) The usage has been extended to the designation of the pitch of particular tones and of instruments. Thus, the second C below middle C is called 8-foot C, and all the tones in the octave above it 8-foot tones, or tones in the 8 foot octave, while the first C below middle C is called 4 foot C, etc. Thus, also, the piccolo is called a 4-foot instrument, because its tones are an octave above the notes written.

13. The commercial name for one of the small plates of tortoise-shell which line the carapace: commonly used in the plural.—14. One of the small marginal plates of the upper shell of the hawkbill turtle. Also called nose.—15 $\frac{1}{2}$. Sediment: same as foots.

R. Choate, Addresses, p. 90.

To take foot, to take to one's heels.
Come on to me now, Livingston,
Or then take foot and flee.
Lord Livingston (Child's Ballads, III, 346).

Washing of feet, a ceremony in the Roman Catholic, Greek, Russian, and some other churches, as those of the Dunkers, Wheelwrightians, etc., in commemoration of Christ's washing of the feet of his disciples after the last supper (John xiii. 4-17), both as a symbol of spiritual cleansing and as a lesson to them of humility and good will. The washing of others' feet, for their relief from the effects of exposure in a hot climate with but slight or no covering, has always been a common practice in Oriental countries, generally performed by menials; and religious ideas have often been associated with the practice. In the Roman Catholic Church the ceremony is observed on Thursday of Holy Week. The pope washes the feet of thirteen poor priests, and the principal priests or prelates of the Roman Catholic churches wash the feet of twelve poor persons. The ceremony is also called mandatum or maundy. See Maundy Thursday.

The little girls were thin and grave. As they footed slowly up the aisle, each one took a moment's glance at the Englishman. R. L. Stevenson, Inland Voyage, p. 193.

2. To tread to measure or music; dance; skip.
He saw a quire of ladies in a round,
That footily footing seem'd to skim the ground.

foot-balister (fūt'bal'is-tér), n. An unmounted archer.

foot-ball (fūt'bál), n. 1. A ball consisting originally of an inflated bladder, now of a hollow globe of india-rubber or of heavy canvas saturated with rubber, cased in leather, round or oval in shape, and designed to be driven by the foot in the game called by the same name. See def. 2.

The sturdy plowman, lustie, strong, and bold, Overcometh the winter with driving the foots-ball,
Forgetting labour and many a grievous fall.
Alex. Barclay, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 100.

2. A game played with such a ball by two parties of players on a level plot of ground, at each end of which is a goal through or beyond which the players strive to drive the ball. There are various ways of playing the game, the two most commonly recognized being the "Association" and the "Rugby" game, the latter either in its original form or as played in America in a modified form. The field is 330 feet long by 160 wide, and in the middle of each end is a goal formed of two upright posts, in the Rugby game 18 feet apart with a cross-bar 10 feet above the ground, and in the Association game 24 feet apart with a cross-bar 8 feet from the ground. There are 11 players on each side (in the Rugby game sometimes 15), divided into runners and backs; the special object of the former being to check their opponents and to rush or push forward the ball in a body, and of the latter to kick or run with the ball. The two sides cast lots, the winner having the privilege of beginning the game with possession of the ball, or of selecting the goal. In the Rugby game the players can kick, run with, or throw the ball (but not throw it forward toward their opponents' goal); in the Association game they can only kick it. The playing is begun by kickings off the ball from midway between the goals, and the players strive to force the ball through or beyond their opponents' goal. In the Association game, to win a goal the ball must be kicked through the goal below the cross-bar, and the side securing the largest number of goals wins the game. In the Rugby game scoring is by goals, touch downs, and safety touch downs or safeties. A goal is won by kicking the ball through or above the goal posts over the cross-bar; a touch down, by carrying the ball behind the goal and there touching it to the ground, which gives the player a try—that is, the right to carry the ball out in front of the goal and try to kick a goal; a safety touch down or safety, by forcing one's opponents to touch the ball to the ground behind one's own goal. The play continues for a certain length of time (in 1890 one hour and ten minutes) divided into two parts by a short intermission, at which time the players change sides. Foot-ball is an ancient game, probably introduced into Great Britain by the Romans, though the first distinct mention of it is in Fitzstephen's History of London, about 1175.

Shew, I'll not be stricken, my lord
Kent. Nor tripped neither, you base foot-ball player.
[Tripping up his heels.] Shak., Learn, I, 4.

The danger attending this pastime occasioned king James I. to say, "From this court I debarre all rough and violent exercises, as the foot-ball, meet for lancing than making able the users thereof."
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 100.

Very well! go too! I cannot go too (narr); nor 'tis not very well! Nay, I think it is sorry; and begin to fiddle my selfe fop in it.

Shak. Othello, iv. 2 (folio, 1623).

Most modern editions read fobbed, fob being a later form of fop.

fop (fop), n. [Cf. ME. fop, foppe, a fool; cf. D. fopper, a wag, G. fopper, a jeerer, woffler, mocker; < fop 1, v.] 1. A fool; a shallow pretender; an ostentatious dandy.

Foppe, v. q. [same as] folet in foot. See folet folet.

May such malicious Fops that Fortune find,
To think themselves alone the Fools designed.

Conquest, Way of the World, Epil.

There is no fop so very near a madman in indifferent company as a political one.

Steele, Tatler, No. 244.

The solemn fop, significant and budge.

A fool with judicious amongst fools a judge.

Campbell, Conversations, l. 200.

2. A man who is ostentatiously nice in manner and appearance; one who invites admiration by conspicuous dress and affectations; a coxcomb; a dandy.

Gods! shall the ravisher display your hair,
While the fops envy and the ladies stare?

Pope, Ep. to the L., iv. 104.

Fops at all corners, lady like to men,
Civeted fellows, small ere they are seen.

Campbell, Conversations, l. 422.

Now a French Fop, like a Poet, is born so, and would be known without clothes: it is his Eyes, his Nose, his Fingers, his Elbows, his Heels, they dance when they walk and sing when they speak.

C. Burnaby, The Reform'd Wife, p. 32.

—Syn. 2. Dandy, Riquet, etc. See coxcomb.

fopdoodle (fop'dū'dl), n. [Formerly also fobdoodle (so cited in Bram. Diet., I. 437), and fopdoudell; < fop² + doodle¹.] An insignificant or contemptible fellow.

See blith, fopdoudella.

M.S. Ashmole, Cat., vol. 48. (Halliwell.)

Where sturdy butlers broke your noodle,

And handled you like a fopdoodle.

Butler, Hudibras.

fopling (fop'ling), n. [*fop*² + *-ling*².] A petty fop.

This mean for empty praise of wit to write,

As foppings grin to show their teeth are white.

Brown, Essay on Satire, II.

Let foppings stare, let fools dandle.

Whittier, The Shoemakers.

foppery (fop'pē-ri), n. and a. [*fop*² + -ery, after D. foppery = G. foppereri, voppereri, cheating, hoax, mystification.] I. n.; pl. fopperies (-iz). 1. Foolishness; foolery; foolish vanity; vain show.

Let not the sound of shallow foppery enter

My sober house. Shak., M. of V., II. 5.

But I shall die over to ye, readers, that this his praising of them is as full of nonsense and scholastic foppery as his meaning to himself discovers to be full of close malignity. Milton, Apology for Smeectymunnus.

The design spreads, till at last true piety and goodness be swallowed up by superstitious fopperies.

Stillington, Sermons, II. 1.

2*f.* A foolish or mocking exhibition.

And I am sorry to hear how other nations do much tax the English of their inability to public ministers of state, and what bellads and paepples, and fopperies and plays, were made against Gondamar for doing his master's business. Howell, Letters (1650).

3. Vain ornaments; gewgaws.

To adorn them [pipes] with beautiful wings and feathers of birds, as likewise with peak, beads, or other such foppery. Beccrey, Virginia, III. 4. 20.

4. Affectation of precision in trifles, or fastidious observance of the prevailing fashion; dandyism; as, the foppery of dress or of manners.

I wish I could say quite foppish were wholly absent from graver subjects. Swift

I have known a woman that never was out of the parish of the St. James to have as many foreign fopperies in her carriage as she could have gleaned up in half the countries of Europe. Addison, Fashions from France

II*f.* foppish; foolish. Darus.

Let any Persian oppose this, and in spite of his haire cut, or love-lock, . . . I'll set my foot to his, and fight it out with him, that their foppish goal is not so good as a Red-herring. Nashe, Lenten stuffe (Hall Mss., VI. 167).

foppish (fop'ish), a. [*fop*² + *-ish*¹.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a fop; affecting or manifesting ostentatious nicety in dress and manner; dandyish.

I appeal, whether it is not better and much more pleasing to see the old Fashion of a dead Friend, or Relation, or Man of Distinction, Painted as he was, than a foppish Night down, and odd Quiffure which he've belonged to the Person Painted. Lester, Journey to Paris, p. 40.

He was a handsome fellow in a manly way, which even the faultless precision of his attire could not make foppish. Harpers' Mag., LXXXI. 611.

= Syn. See finesse.

foppishly (fop'ish-ly), adv. In a foppish manner; in a vain, trifling, or affected manner as to dress or deportment.

foppishness (fop'ish-nēs), n. The condition or quality of being foppish.

But this foppishness

(b) Posterior, for the passage of a vein. — Coracoscaphular foramen. In some animals, a hole formed by the articulation of the coracoid bone with the scapula. — Cordiform foramen. See condylar. — Cotyloid foramen. A notch in the acetabulum or socket of the thigh bone, converted into a hole by a ligament, for the passage of vessels and nerves. See cut under innominate. — Dental foramen. the termination of the dental canal of the lower jaw, through which vessels and nerves emerge from the interior of the bone upon the face. — Diaphragmatic foramina. several holes through the diaphragm, for the passage of the esophagus, the aorta, the pneumogastric nerves, the vena cava inferior, and other structures. — Epitrochlear foramen. foramen epitrochleare, the supraprocoracoid foramen upon the inner condyle of the humerus of many animals, sometimes present, or represented by a groove, in man. — Ethmoidal foramina, anterior and posterior, openings in the orbit. In the articulation between the ethmoid and the frontal bone, for the passage of vessels and nerves. — External carotid foramen. the external orifice of the carotid canal. — Foramen cecum. (a) Of the frontal bone, a depression looking a process of the dura mater, and either impervious or transmitting a vein. (b) Of the medulla oblongata, a cul-de-sac forming the termination of the anterior median fissure behind the pons. Also called foramen cecum of Vagel and Azpy. (c) Of the tongue, a depression about the large middle circumvallate papilla. — Foramen commune anterius. Same as foramen of Monro. — Foramen intercarpi. the foramen of the intercarpi, an opening between or among certain bones of the carpus of batrachians. — Foramen lacrum anterius. the sphenoidal foramen between the greater and lesser wings of the sphenoid bone, transmitting the third, fourth, first division of the fifth, and the sixth cranial nerves, and the ophthalmic vein. See cut under sphenoid. — Foramen lacrum medium. the interval between the apex of the petrous portion of the temporal bone and the sphenoid and occipital bones, in relation with the inner opening of the carotid canal. See cut under skull. — Foramen lacrum posterius. the jugular foramen, a fissure between the petrous portion of the temporal bone and the occipital bone, giving passage to the internal jugular vein, and to the glossopharyngeal, pneumogastric, and spinal accessory nerves. See cut under skull. — Foramen magnum. the great hole in the occipital bone for the passage of the medulla oblongata and its membranes, the spinal accessory nerve, and the vertebral arteries; the passage from the cranial cavity to the spinal canal. — Foramen of Monro. the communication between the lateral ventricles of the brain and the third ventricle, transmitting the choroid plexus. See cut under encephalon. — Foramen of Soemmering. a deceptive appearance, as of an opening presented by the retina of the eye at the yellow spot. See retina. — Foramen of Stenson. Same as canaliculus meatus. See canaliculus. — Foramen of Winslow. the communication between the greater and lesser cavities of the peritoneum. — Foramen ovale. (a) Of the heart, the communication, in the fetus, between the right and the left auricle, closed soon after birth; when persistent it gives rise to cyanosis. (b) Of the sphenoid bone, a hole in the greater wing of the sphenoid, or between this and the temporal bone, for the passage of the third division of the fifth cranial nerve. See cut under sphenoid. — Foramen Panizza. the foramen of Panizza, the communication between the right and the left nostrils of reptiles. — Foramen rotundum. a round hole in the greater wing of the sphenoid, for the passage of the second division of the fifth cranial nerve. See cut under sphenoid. — Foramen spinosum. a hole in the greater wing of the sphenoid, transmitting the principal meningeal artery. — Foramen transversarium. a hole in the transverse process of a cervical vertebra, as in birds and mammals, formed by ankylosis of a cervical rib with the transverse process proper. — Vertebral foramen. Foramina. — Foramen Vesalii. a minute inconstant hole in the sphenoid bone, transmitting a vein. — Foramina Thebesii. orifices of small veins which empty into the right auricle of the heart. — Inferior dental foramen. the tub of the inferior dental canal in the lower jaw-bone. — Intraorbital foramen. a hole in the superior maxillary bone, near the lower border of the orbit, for the exit of so much of the second division of the fifth nerve as appears upon the face. See cut under orbit. — Internal auditory foramen. the meatus auditorius internus, for the passage from the cranial cavity into the temporal bone of the auditory and facial nerves. See cuts under craniofacial and ear. — Internal carotid foramen. the internal orifice of the carotid canal. — Interorbital foramen. a vacancy in the bony plate separating the orbits in birds, etc. — Intervertebral foramina. holes formed between any two contiguous vertebrae for the exit of spinal nerves. — Jugular foramen. See foramen lacrum posterius. — Malar foramina. holes in the malar bone for the passage of nerves and vessels. — Mastoid foramen. a hole in or near the mastoid portion of the temporal bone for the passage of a vein. — Medullary foramen. the hole in any bone giving entrance to the proper nutrient artery of the bone. Also called nutrient foramen. — Mental foramen. the outlet upon the chin of the inferior dental canal of the lower jaw bone, giving exit to so much of the third division of the fifth cranial nerve as appears upon the chin. — Nutrient foramen. See medullary foramen. — Obturator foramen. the thyrid foramen, a large opening or fenestra in the innominate bone, representing an interval between the pubis and ischium, mostly closed by the obturator membrane, and transmitting the obstructing vessels and nerves; sometimes in lower animals a notch. See cut under innominate. — Occipital foramen, in botany. the opening by which the cavity of the head communicates with that of the neck. See cut under Hymenoptera. — Olfactory foramina. the numerous holes in the cribriform plate of the ethmoid bone, transmitting the olfactory nerves. — Optic foramen. the round hole in the sphenoid bone transmitting the optic nerve and ophthalmic artery. See cuts under orbit and sphenoid. — Palatine foramina, anterior and posterior. holes in the bony palate for the passage of vessels and nerves; small in man, in some mammals constituting great vacuities. Also called palatine foramen. — Pterygopalatine foramen. an opening between the pterygoid and the palatine bones. — Sacral foramina. intervertebral foramina in the sacral region. — Sacrosciotic foramen. a notch in the posterior border of the lumbar bone, converted by ligament into a hole, through which passes the pyriformis muscle, the sciatic nerve, and other structures. — Sphenopalatine foramen. a notch or hole in the palatine bone, by which the sphenomaxillary fossa communicates with the nasal cavity. — Stylomastoid foramen. a hole in the temporal bone, near the root of the styloid process, giving exit to the facial nerve, and entrance to the stylomastoid artery. See cut under skull. — Thyroid foramen. See oblique foramen. — Vertebral or vertebral foramen. a hole in the transverse processes of cervical vertebrae, transmitting the vertebral artery. See cut under vertebra. — Vidian foramen. the Vidian canal. See canal.

foraminifer (fo-ram-i-nif'ēr), n. [NL. foraminifer; see foraminiferous.] One of the Foraminifera.

Foraminifera (fo-ram-i-nif'ērā), n. pl. [NL. neut. pl. of foraminifer; see foraminiferous.] An order of Rhizopoda, belonging to the subkingdom Protozoa, furnished with a shell or test, simple or complex, usually perforated by pores (foramina), whence the name. The shell may be composed of horny matter, or of carbonate of lime secreted from the water in which they live, or may be fabricated by sticking together various matters, such as particles of sand. Owing to the resemblance of their convoluted chambered shells to those of the nautilus, they were at first reckoned among the most highly organized mollusks. In reality they are among the simplest of the Protozoa. The body of a foraminifer is composed of granular, gelatinous, highly elastic sarcodae, which not only fills the shell, but passes through the perforations to the exterior, thus giving off long thread-like processes, called pseudopodia, interlacing one another so as to form a net like a spider's web. Internally the sarcodae body exhibits no structure or definite organs of any kind. A nucleus, which at one time was believed to be absent, has been discovered in the sarcodae. A remarkable formation known as monothalamous receives its name from the presence of large, coin-shaped foraminifers, generally about as large as an English shilling. The name is based on the French foraminifères of A. D'Orbigny, who regarded these organisms as cephalopodan mollusks, and named them from the foramina by means of which the cells communicate. He divided them into Helicostoma (with the subdivisions H. nautiloides, ammonoides, and foraminoides), Stichostoma, Endothecium, Apothecium, and Entonodopora, terms corresponding to Helicostoma, Stichostoma, Endothecium, Apothecium, and Entonodopora. The most approved recent classification of the Foraminifera is by H. R. Brady, who divides the order into the families Groenlandiæ, Melchioræ, Atterhouschiæ, L'indolæ, Tortulidæ, Chilostomidæ, Lopandæ, Globulidæ, Rotalidæ, and Nummulidæ. The problematic fossil of the Laurentian rocks of Canada, named Rensselaeria, has been referred to the order, but its foraminiferal nature has been denied by most recent naturalists. By some authors the Foraminifera under the name Reticularia, are regarded as a class of protozoans, and divided into 10 orders corresponding with the above-named families. Thalamophora is a third name of these organisms.

foraminiferal (fo-ram-i-nif'ēr-al), a. 1. Consisting of or containing Foraminifera: as, foraminiferal mud; foraminiferal deposits.

There can be no doubt that the foraminiferal shower fell over the area occupied by the grey zone and the red clay just as persistently as elsewhere.

8. In physics: (a) Strictly, the immediate cause of a change in the velocity or direction of motion of a body; a component acceleration, due to a special cause, paired with the mass of the moving body; a directed or vector quantity of the dimensions of a mass multiplied by an acceleration or rate of change of a velocity, this quantity representing the instantaneous effect of any definite cause affecting the motion of a body. The distinct mechanical apprehension of force is modern. Archimedes discovered the elements of the theory of the pressures upon bodies at rest, but it was not until the seventeenth century that, by the labors of mathematicians from Galileo to Newton, the general mode in which bodies move became sufficiently understood to give a perfectly definite meaning to the word, and indeed the development of the idea has not yet ceased. A particle infinitely remote from others, so that no special influences would work upon it, would retain a velocity constant in amount and direction. The effect of any cause is to produce an alteration of velocity, and when this happens the cause is said to exert force upon the particle. The explanation of what is meant by a force is dependent upon the mechanical notion of the composition of motions, according to which, for example, if a man walks on the deck of a ship, his motion relatively to the sea is said to be compounded of his motion relatively to the ship and of the motion of the ship relatively to the sea. In general terms, if a particle which at any instant is at any point of space, A, has a partial or component motion which at the end of a second would carry it to a point B, and at the same time has another component motion which would carry it in the same time to a point C, the result of the two motions will be that it is carried to a point D such that ABCD is a parallelogram, as in the figure. It necessarily follows that accelerations of velocity are compounded in a similar manner; namely, if a particle is at any instant under such circumstances that according to a law of nature its velocity undergoes a the acceleration represented by the line AB while at the same time, owing to other circumstances, it undergoes another alteration represented by the line AC, these two alterations are compounded by the same principle; and if the point D completes the parallelogram ABCD, the alteration represented by the diagonal AD is the result of compounding the two other alterations. This is called the principle of the parallelogram of forces. The polygon of of forces is merely a complicated application of the same principle, according to which, if the velocity of a particle experiences several simultaneous alterations, represented by all the successive sides but one of a polygon taken in one continuous order, the result is an alteration represented by the last side in the direction of the last point from the first. The operation of thus compounding several simultaneous changes of velocity is termed the composition of forces, the partial changes are termed components, and the result of the operation the resultant. When a body is under the influence of a force, it has what is called a tendency to motion, which consists in its actually receiving, under all circumstances, in each unit of time, as long as the force acts, a motion in a definite direction and of a fixed amount, which motion is compounded with the motion already impressed upon the body, together with the effects of other forces to which it may be simultaneously subject. Thus, every body at the surface of the earth, in consequence of the force of gravity, actually receives an increase of downward velocity at the rate of 32 feet per second; and if it does not fall on the whole, it is because it is at the same time, in consequence of the elastic compression of the support upon which it rests, projected upward with the same increase of velocity per second. The component forces when due to definite causes are also called impressed forces; the resultant of all of them is called the effective force. By the same principle, any alteration of velocity may be separated into several, and this is called the resolution of forces, although no one of the components may represent the total effect of any definite cause. When a velocity or alteration of velocity is thus resolved into three components at right angles to one another, each is termed the resultant resolved in that direction. By the law of action and reaction, whenever a body has its velocity altered owing to any cause, some other body has its velocity altered in precisely the opposite direction. The alterations are not of equal magnitude, but when each is multiplied by a quantity which is constant for each portion of matter undergoing an alteration of velocity—this constant being termed the mass or amount of matter—the two products are equal. All alterations of velocity take place gradually and continuously. The rate of change of velocity, together with its direction, coupled with or multiplied by the mass of the body undergoing the change of motion, is a force, properly so called, or accelerating force. According to this, the accepted view of the matter, force is nothing occult, but is simply the product of a mass by a component acceleration due to a definite position relatively to another body or to some other circumstance. Nevertheless, many writers regard force as an occult something which causes or explains the alterations of the velocities of bodies, and no writers who employ the word at all altogether avoid the use of phrases which seem to bear such a meaning. An impulsive force is the amount of a sudden finite change of motion multiplied by the mass of the moving body; it is not supposed there really are any such forces, but it is occasionally convenient to regard forces as impulsive. A force is defined by its intensity or amount, its direction, its point of application, and the time at which it exists. The point of application of a force is the particle which is immediately and directly affected by it.

Force, then, is of two kinds, the stress of a strained adjoining body, and the attraction or repulsion of a distant body.

H. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 22.

Loosely—(b) Any mechanical cause or element. This use of the word, which dates from before the development of clear conceptions of dynamics, is now obsolete with physicists except in special connections. Older writers speak of momentum and even of inertia as a force. Such expressions and even the reference to pressures as forces (except in the phrase centrifugal force), are now obsolete. On the other hand, accelerations are still frequently called forces. Energy is now rarely termed force, except in the phrase living force (vis viva); thus, in technical language, it is no longer correct to speak of the force of the waves of a cannon-ball, but of their power or energy. Special affections of matter giving rise to forces, such as electricity and electrification, are frequently called forces, although they are properly powers. Other phenomena, such as electricity, light, etc., are still loosely called forces by some technical writers.

If we accept force as the dynamic aspect of existence, the correlate of matter, we have a firm, speculative foundation for the first law of motion, which expresses in an intelligible formula both the constancy of existence and the varieties of its distribution.

The principle had been vaguely employed by the ancient astronomer Aristarchus to explain why the moon does not fall to the earth. (a) Properly, a quantity of the dimensions of a force, the product of the mass of a particle moving along a curved path into a component accelerative elongation of the radius of curvature of the path (mdv/dt), due to the inertia of the particle; inertia considered as the cause of such acceleration. If, while a wheel is revolving uniformly, a particle is suddenly released from its periphery, this particle will (in the absence of forces) fly off on a tangent without change of velocity. The path of the particle, considered as relative to the revolving wheel, is an involute of the circle. Hence, at the instant of release the direction of the relative motion of the particle is radial to the wheel, and it can be shown that, while the velocity of this motion would be null at that instant, its acceleration would be equal to the square of the velocity of the particle divided by the radius of the wheel. It is simplest to say that this accelerative elongation of the radius vector always takes place, and that if, notwithstanding, the particle does not leave the wheel, it is because the centrifugal acceleration due to inertia is precisely balanced by a centripetal acceleration due to the forces which hold the particle in place. But the centrifugal force does not at all depend upon the principle of action and reaction. If a particle moves upon any curved path whatever, any infinitesimal part of this path is occupied by a circle, and inertia will produce the same accelerative elongation of the radius vector from the center of this circle as before; and this radius vector is the radius of curvature of the path. As thus defined, the centrifugal force is not a true force, since it results from the resolution of the motion into a radial and a circular part, while the principle of the parallelogram of forces (see def. 8 (a)) forbids such a resolution of forces proper. Thus, if a particle moves in a circular orbit about an attracting center, since the radius of curvature is constant, the centrifugal force must be balanced by a precisely equal and opposite attracting force. But a body which was really subjected to two equal and opposite forces would move as if subjected to none—that is, not in a circle, but in a straight line. The fact is that the only influence to which the body is subjected are I, its inertia, and A, the attraction—that is, $I + A$. The centrifugal force is equal to $-A$, and balances the attraction, but it is a part of the inertia, the remainder of which is $I + A$. (b) In erroneous use, a repulsive force causing a revolving body to fly away from the center of revolution. Writers on attractions sometimes so use the word. (c) A fictitious force repelling every particle of the earth from the axis by an amount equal to the centrifugal force in sense (a). With this hypothesis, and supposing the earth not to rotate, the static effects are the same as in the actual case; but the dynamical effects are different. (d) As used by many high authorities, the reaction of a moving body against the force which makes it move in a curved path. In this sense it is a real force. It does not, however, act upon the moving body, but upon the deflecting body; and, far from giving the former a tendency to fly away from the center, it is but an aspect of that stress which holds it to the curved trajectory. The centrifugal force in sense (a) may be regarded as that in sense (d) transferred from the deflecting to the deflected bodies. (These differences of meaning explain the apparently conflicting views of writers.)

When I was about nine years old I was taken to hear a course of lectures, given by an itinerant lecturer in a country town, to get as much as I could of the second half of a good, sound, philosophical omniscience. . . . "You have heard what I have said of the wonderful centripetal force, by which Divine Wisdom has retained the planets in their orbits round the Sun. But, ladies and gentlemen, it must be clear to you that if there were no other force in action, this centripetal force would draw our earth and the other planets into the Sun, and universal ruin would ensue. To prevent such a catastrophe, the same wisdom has implanted a centrifugal force of the same amount, and directly opposite." . . . I had never heard of Alfonso X of Castile, but I ventured to think that if Divine Wisdom had put the planets alone it would come to the same thing, with equal and opposite troubles saved. De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 481.

Deflecting force and centrifugal force are but two different names for the same force, applied to it according as its action on the revolving body or on the guiding body is under consideration. Randall, Applied Mechanics, § 436.

The student cannot be too early warned of the dangerous error into which so many have fallen, who have supposed that a mass has a tendency to fly outward from a centre about which it is revolving, and therefore exerts a centrifugal force which requires to be balanced by a centripetal force. Tait, Energy, Brit., X V, 662.

Although the earth is really revolving about its axis, so that all problems relating to the relative equilibrium of the earth itself and the bodies on its surface are really dynamical problems, we know that they may be treated statically by introducing, in addition to the attraction, that fictitious force which we call the centrifugal force. Stokes, On Attraction, § 1.

See deflective. — Deflecting force or tangential force, a force acting in a direction at right angles to that of the motion of the body, and producing a curvature of its path. — Dissipation of force. See dissipation. — Distributed force, in mechanics, a force which is not applied at a point, but is spread over a surface or disseminated through a solid. All real forces are distributed. — Electromotive force. See electromotive. — Equilibrium of forces. See equilibrium. — Equivalence of force. See equivalence. — External forces, those forces which act upon masses of matter at sensible distances, as gravitation. — Fixed force. See fixed. — Force Bill, in U. S. Hist.: (a) A bill to enforce the tariff, introduced into Congress at the time of the nullification excitement in 1833. It became a law March 2d, 1833. (b) A bill for the protection of political and civil rights in the South. It became a law May 31st, 1870. (c) A bill similar to (b), but of still more stringent character, enacted April 20th, 1871. — Force of destruction. See destruction. — Force of inertia. See momentum. In great force, ravenously voracious or energetic; in effective condition generally applied to powers of conversation or oratory, as, he was a great force at the dinner or the meeting last night. [Colloq.] — Internal forces, forces which act only on the constituent particles of matter, and at insensible distances, as cohesion. — Line of force. See equipotential surface, under equipotential. — Living force. See vitality. — Magne-crystalline force. See magne-crystalline. — Molar force, a force producing motions in large masses of matter. — Molecular force, a force acting between molecules, but insensible at sensible distances. — Moment of a force. See moment. — Moral force, the power of acting on the reason in judging and determining. — Motive power or force. See motive, a. — Moving force. See momentum. — No force, no matter, no consequence. See def. 6, above, and to make no force, below.

No force, quod he, tellth me at yowre greet Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 490.

"No force," quod Merlin, "he shall do right well; but take a spere, and followe after, ye and your brother and Yllm."
Merlin (F. E. T. S.), ll. 221.

Non-conservative forces, forces which depend upon the velocities of the bodies between which they act. Such forces are alone capable of setting up rotations. Friction and viscosity are examples of such forces, and these are explained by physicists as the result of chance encounters, etc., among almost innumerable molecules. Other effects of this sort are the conduction of heat, the dissipation of energy, the development of living forces, etc. — Odic force, odylic force. See od-. — Of force, of necessity, necessarily; unavoidably; perforce.

Good reasons must, of force, give place to better.
Shak., J. C., IV, 3.

This prince, of force, must be belov'd of Heaven, Whom Heaven hath thus proov'd
Fletcher (and others), Bloody Brother, III, 1.

Parallelogram of forces. See def. 8 (a). — Physical force men. See Charlton. — Reciprocating force, a force which acts alternately with and against the motion of the body, as gravity does upon an oscillating pendulum. — Resolution of forces. See def. 8 (a). — Simple force, in law, unlawful violence attended by no other crime; distinguished from compound force. — Tangential force. See deflecting force. — Thermo-electric or thermo-electromotive force. See thermo-electric. — To be in force (midit), to be prepared for action with a large or full force.

The enemy was in force at Cortijo, the junction of the two most important railroads in the Mississippi valley.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I, 380.

To hunt at forest. See hunt. To make, do, or give no force, to care not; consider of no importance. See no force, above.

When the here spoke of the grete light and blisse of hevyn, that make no force.
Gesta Romanorum, p. 14.

To my better did no reverence.
Of my sovereignty gaf no force at al
Quoted in Babes Book (F. E. T. S.), p. 2111.

Triangle of force. See triangle. — Tube of force. See tube. — Unit of force. See unit. — Syn strength, etc. (see power); efficacy, efficiency, potency, cogency, virtue. — Force, Compulsion, Coercion, Constraint, Restraint. Among these force is the most general. Compulsion and coercion are generally more active, pushing one onward; constraint and restraint less active, the last being simply a holding back. The first three could be applied to a person a treatment of himself only by a lively figure, constraint and restraint express equally self-control and control of others. Constraint upon one's self is much harder than restraint.

By force they could not introduce these gods;
For ten to one in former days was odds.
Dryden, Abs. and Achil., l. 122.

Give you a reason on compulsion? If reasons were as plenty as blackberries, I would give no man a reason upon compulsion.
Shak., I Hen. IV., II, 4.

Congress had neglected to provide measures and means for coercion (in dealing with the seceding States). The conservative sentiment of the country protested loudly against everything but coercion.
The Century, XXXV, 614.

Bitter constraint, and sad or caution dear,
Compels me to disturb your season due.
Milton, Lycidas, l. 6.

Certain complex restraints on extremes of altruism exist, which, in another way, force back the individual upon a normal egoism.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 90.

force¹ (fôrâs, f.; pret. and pp. forced, ppr. forcing. [< ME. forecen, forecen (= D. forecaren = G. foreciren = Dan. forcere = Sw. forcera), < OF. forcer, former, F. forcer = Pr. forçar = Sp. forzar = Pg. furcar = It. forzare, < ML. fortiare, force, fortify, < fortia, force, strength, etc.; see fortel, a.] I. trans. 1. To set effectively upon by force, physical, mental, or moral, in any manner; impel by force; compel; constrain.

A meale aparte kyndles a great fyre if it be force to burne.
Babees Book (F. E. T. S.), p. 94.

I'll undertake to land them on our coast,
And force the tyrant from his seat by war.
And force the tyrant from Shak., 3 Hen. VI., III, 2.

I have been told that one hundred and sixty minnows have been found in a Trout's belly; either the Trout had devoured so many, or the miller that gave it a friend of mine had forced them down his throat after he had taken him.
J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 95.

Like a bow long forc'd into a curve,
The mind, releas'd from too constrain'd a nerve,
Flew to its first position with a spring.
Cooper, Table-Talk, l. 622.

2. To overcome or overthrow by force; accomplish one's purpose upon or in regard to by force or compulsion; compel to succumb, give way, or yield.

Will he force the queen also before me in the house?
Rather vii. 8.

Then they flatter'd him and made him do ill things; now they would force him against his Conscience.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 63.

I should have forced thee soon with other arms.
Milton, S. A., l. 1099.

When wine has given indecent language birth,
And forced the floodgates of licentious mirth.
Cooper, Conversation, l. 304.

Some forced the breach, others scaled the ramparts.
Prescott, Ford, and Isa., II, 10.

3. To effect by effort or a special or unusual application of force; bring about or promote by some artificial means; as, to force the passage of a river against an enemy; to force a jest.

If you bow low, may he'll touch the bunnet,
Or fling a forc'd smile at you for a favour.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, II, 4.

Some twenty times a day, nay, not so little,
Do I force errands, frame ways and excuses,
To come into her sight.
Middleton, Changeling, II, 1.

A successful speculator or a "merchant prince" may force his way into good society in England, he may be presented at court, and flourish at court balls.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II, 162.

4. To cause to grow, develop, or mature under unnaturally stimulating or favorable conditions. Specifically: (a) To hasten or enlarge the growth of, as flowers, fruits, etc., by means of artificial heat and shelter, as in hothouses or hotheds. (b) To flourish, as wine, by a short process or in a short time. (c) In general, to subject to unnatural stimulation or pressure, in order to accomplish a desired result before the usual or natural time, as in training the young.

5. To impose or impress by force; compel the acceptance or endurance of: with on or upon; as, to force one's company or views on another; to force conviction on the mind. — 6. To furnish with a force; man; garrison.

Were they not forc'd with those that should be ours,
We might have met them darest, bend to heard,
And beat them backward home. Shak., Macbeth, v. 6.

7. To put in force; make binding; enforce. — 8. In card-playing: (a) In what, to compel (a player) to trump a trick by leading a card of a suit of which he has none, which trick otherwise would be taken by an opponent; as, to force one's partner. (b) To compel (a person) to play so as to make known the strength of his hand. — 9. To attach force or importance to; have regard to; care for.

I force not Philautus his fury, so I may have Euphros his friendship.
Lily, Euphros, Act. of Wit, p. 81.

For me, I force not argument a straw,
Since that my case is past the help of law.
Shak., Lucres, I, 1021.

Forced heir, in law: (a) An heir in whose favor the law provides that a part at least of the inheritance shall not be devised away from him. (b) In Roman law, one obliged to accept a succession however involved the estate might be. — Forced march, sale, etc. See the nouns. — To force one's hand. (a) In card playing, same as 8 (b). — (b) To compel one to disclose his intentions, plans, or resources.

The potato famine in Ireland precipitated a crisis, forced Peel's hand, and compelled him to open the ports, which, once open, could not, it was clear, again be closed.
S. Dowell, Travels in England, IV, 12.

— Syn. 1 and 2. To oblige, necessitate, coerce.

II. 4. Intrans. 1. To use force or violence; make violent effort; strive; endeavor.

Pinning with gifts to winne his wanton heart.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., April.

Howbeit, in the end, perceiving these men did more forcibly force to get up the hill.

North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 327.

2. To be of force or importance; be of significance or consequence.

It little forceth how long a man live, but how well and virtuously.
J. Udall, On Mark v.

3. To care; hesitate; scruple.

Your oath once broke, you force not to forswear.

I force not of such fooleries (omens), but if I have any skill in North saying (as in south I have none), it doth prognosticate that I shall change copie from a Duke to a King.
Camden, Remains. Wise speeches.

force² (fôrs), v. t.; pret. and pp. forced, ppr. forcing. [< ME. forcen, forcen; a corruption of forcel¹, v. t., by confusion with force¹, v. t.] To stuff; furco.

Fora hit with powder of camd or good gynger Libert's Curious Characters, p. 31.

To what form, but that he is should wilt larded with malice, and make forced with all, turn him?
Jack, T. and C., v. 3.

force³ (fôrs), n. [< F. ducl], also written forse, fors, foss; < F. for, mod. foss, a waterfall, also a brook, stream. Sw. fors, a torrent, = Dan. foss, a waterfall; hence for, stream in torrents. Sw. fors, gush, rush. = Dan. fors, stream in torrents, foam, boil. A waterfall. [North Eng.]

After dinner I went along the Millthorpe turnpike four miles to see the falls of force of the river Kent.
Gray, to Dr. Wharton, Oct. 9, 1789.

force⁴ (fôrs), v. t.; pret. and pp. forced, ppr. forcing. [< ME. forcen, foreyn, < AF. forcer, clip, shear, < OF. forcer, F. forcer, shears, = F. force, forsa = F. force, forbera, forber, forber, < L. forpes, pl. of forper, tongs, a confused form, mixing forper, scissors, and forper, tongs: see forper and forper.] 1. To clip or shear, as the beard or wool. In particular—2. To clip off the upper and more hairy part of (wool), for export: a practice forbidden by stat. 8 Henry VI., c. 20.

forceable (fôr'sa-bl), a. [< force¹ + -able. Cf. forcible.] That may be forced; amenable to force.

Since in humane laws there be more things arbitrable than forcible, he [Trajan] should advise his Judges to approach more unto reason than opinion.
Letters of Sir Antonio de Gueraza (trans. 1575), p. 20.

forced (fôrst), p. a. [Pp. of force¹, v.] 1. Effected by an unusual application of force or effort.

He travelled by forced journeys, frequently changing his jaded horses.
Levy, Granada, p. 53.

If there were no other phenomena of will than those of forced attention, it would be necessary to admit the probability that all the mental activities are purely mechanical and absolutely dependent upon the action of the nervous system under the existing influence of stimuli.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 33.

2. Overtrained; unnatural; affected; artificial.

Whether or no the city of Chazomine might extend across any part of the high ground, so as that an island or two in that bay might be said to lie opposite to it, is very uncertain, and rather too forced an interpretation of Strabo.
Packer, Description of the East, II. 11.

The joy assumed, while sorrow dimmed the eyes,
The forced and smiles that follow'd sudden sighs.
Crabbe, Works, I. 49.

force-diagram (fôr's-di-gram), n. See diagram.

forcedly (fôr'sed-li), adv. In a forced manner; violently; constrainedly; unnaturally. T. Burnett. [Rare.]

forcedness (fôr'sed-nes), n. The state of being forced. Worthington.

forceful (fôr's-fûl), a. [< force + -ful.] 1. Possessing force; forcible; expressing or representing with force.

There is a sea-piece of Bayard's in the Louvre, which, though nothing very remarkable in any quality of art, is at least forceful, agreeable, and, as far as it goes, natural.
Ruskin, Modern Painters, II. v. 87.

The more forceful the current, the more sharp the ripple from any alien substance it encountered.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 123.

2. Impelled by violence; driven with force; acting with power; violent; impetuous.

Against the steel he threw His forceful spear.
Dryden, Encl. I. II. 65

Why, what need we Commune with you of this? but rather follow
Our forceful instigation?
Shak., W. T. II. 1

forcefully (fôr's-fûl-i), adv. In a forceful or violent manner; violently; impetuously.

Not so forcefully as half a generation ago, perhaps, but still forcefully. S. I. Clemens, Life on Mississippi, p. 407.

forcefulness (fôr's-fûl-nes), n. The character of being forceful.

It is in the force and wildness stand in antithesis to the spirit of art at beauty and culture.
The Academy, May 3, 1888, p. 153.

force-function (fôr's-funk-shon), n. In math., a function expressing work in terms of position. It is commonly written $\sum (X dx + Y dy + Z dz)$, where X , Y , and Z are the rectangular components of the impressed force, and x , y , and z those of the position; and where the sign of summation refers to the different particles (translation and all the primordial forces of nature have force-functions, but viscosity and other forces which are merely phenomena derived from the action of chance upon innumerable molecules have none.

forceless (fôr's-less), a. [< force¹ + -less.] Having little or no force; feeble; impotent.

The tyrannous bishops are ejected, their courts dissolved, their cannons forceless, their regiments cashiered, their ceremonies useless and despised.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 7.

forcelett (fôr's-let), n. [< ME. forcelette, < ML. forcelletum, forcelletum, accom. dim. forms, after OF. of ML. fortis, OF. force, a stronghold, a fort, fortification, a particular use of ML. fortis, force, strength: see force¹, and cf. the equiv. fort, fortress, fortalice, etc.] A small fort; a blockhouse.

In Egypt there ben but few forcelettes or Castelles, because that the Contree is so strong of him self.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 47.

forcely (fôr's-li), a. [< ME. forselly; < force¹ + -ly.] Strong; powerful.

The fife was a sure mane thane fife of this othere,
A forselly mane and a fife with fowand lippe.
Morris Arthur, MS. Lincoln, I. 1. (Haltwell)

forcemeat (fôr's-mēt), n. [For force meat or forced meat: see force² for force¹, and meat.] In cookery, meat chopped fine and seasoned, either served up alone or used as stuffing; forced meat.

forcement (fôr's-mēt), n. [< force¹ + -ment.] The act of forcing; violence.

We sought no kingdom, we desired no crown.
It was imposed upon us by constraint,
Like golden fruit hung on a barren tree;
And will you count such forment tree-bery?
Webster and Decker, St. Thomas Wyat.

forcené (fôr-se-nâ'), a. [Heraldic F.] In her-, rearing on its hind legs: said of a horse. Also frighted.

force-piece (fôr's-pēs), n. In mining, a piece of timber placed in a level shaft to keep the ground open.

forceps (fôr'seps), n. [< L. forceps, a pair of tongs, pincers, forceps, appar. lit. something by which to grasp hot things, < for- (f) in formus, warm, formus, a furnace, etc., + capere, take: see capere, etc.] 1. An instrument, such as pincers or tongs, used for seizing, holding, or moving objects which it would be impracticable to manipulate with the fingers. Such instruments are used by watchmakers and jewelers in delicate manipulations, by dentists for the forcible extraction of teeth; by accoucheurs for grasping and steadying the head of the fetus in delivery, or for extracting the fetus; by surgeons for grasping and holding parts in dissection, for taking up an artery, etc., and in blowpipe analysis (and then platinum pointed to hold the fragment of the mineral whose fusibility, etc., is being tested).

2. In zool. and anat., some part or process of the body like a forceps; any forcipate organ. Specifically—(a) In anat., the fibers passing backward on each side from the apiculus of the corpus callosum to the posterior and upper part of the occipital lobes. (b) In anat., a pair of movable horny appendages, curved or bent inward like forceps, found on the exterior of the abdomen of many insects. In the earwigs they are often very long, and are used in tucking the delicate folding wings under the short tegmina, and also as weapons of defense. (See cut under earwig.) In most other groups they are found only in the males, and serve for seizing and retaining the females. Alveolar, anal, bicuspid, bulldog, etc., forceps. See the qualifying words. Cataract forceps, an instrument resembling the dissecting forceps, but much finer, used in operating for cataract. Dilating forceps, a surgical forceps used to dilate a passage or meatus. Dissecting or ligature forceps, a forceps used in dissecting, to lay hold of delicate parts. Fulcrum forceps, an instrument used by dentists, consisting of a forceps in which one beak is furnished with a hinged metal plate, padded with India rubber, which rests against the gum, while the other beak has the usual tooth or gouge shape.

Polypus forceps. See polypus.

forceps-candlestick (fôr'seps-kan'dl-stik), n. Same as clip-candlestick.

forceps-tail (fôr'seps-tail), n. A book-name of an earwig; any insect of the family Forficulidae: so called from the anal forceps.

force-pump (fôr's-pump), n. A pump, of widely varying types, which delivers a liquid under pressure, so as to eject it forcibly; distinguished from a lift-pump, in which the liquid is simply lifted and runs out of the spout. Also called forcing-pump. See pump.

forcer¹ (fôr'ser), n. One who or that which forces, drives, compels, or constrains.

How much bloodshed have the forcers of conscience to answer for?
Wilson, Civil Power
Specifically—(a) In mech., a solid piston applied to a pump for the purpose of producing a constant stream, or of raising water to a greater height than it can be raised by the pressure of the atmosphere. See pump. (b) In for-mach men, a small pump worked by hand, used in sinking small ditches or pits.

forcer², n. [Early mod. E. also corruptly forcer, forser; < ME. forcer, forser, forser, < OF. forcer, forchier, forger, forger, forger, = F. for- siere, forsiere (ML. reflex forserius), a cheat, casket; perhaps lit. 'a strong box,' ult. < L. fortis, strong (see force¹, n.); or otherwise ult. (like forger) < L. fabrica, a workshop, fabricari, frame, build, make: see forger¹. Cf. forset.] A cheat; a rascal.

And in hur forcer ache can hym kaste,
That same God that Judas sold.
MS. Cantab. VI. II. 38, f. 46. (Haltwell)

I have a girl in my forcer.
MS. Douce 175, p. 67. (Haltwell)

forcett, n. [Early mod. E. also forset, forsette; var. (with dim. -et) of forcer², q. v.] Same as forcer². Florio.

forchet, n. [ME.: see fourch.] Same as fourch.

And after the rage boom kyteth eyn also,
The forche and the syde eyn bytwene,
And loke that your knyves ay whettid bene;
Thenne turne up the forche, and rote theyn wyth blood,
For to saue grece, so doo men of good.
Boke of St. Albans, 1486.

forcible (fôr'si-bl), a. [< force¹ + -ible. Cf. forceable.] 1. Characterized by the exertion or use of force; energetic; vigorous; violent; as, a forcible current; forcible means or measures.

Common forcible ways make not an end of evil, but leave hatred and malice behind them.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., III. 12.

2. Done or effected by force; procured or brought about by the use of force: as, a forcible abduction.

The abdication of king James the advocates on that side look upon to have been forcible and unjust, and consequently void.
Saunders.

3. Having force or cogency; strong; potent; efficacious: as, a forcible argument.

How forcible are right words!
But I have reasons strong and forcible.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., I. 2.

All the most weighty arguments and most forcible persuasions are to such [hardened sinners] but like showers falling upon a rock.
Stillinger, Sermons, II. III.

Forcible detainer, in law, a violent withholding from a person of lands or goods belonging to him. Forcible entry, in law, an actual entry, by means of violence or threats, into houses or lands without authority of law. It implies intent to take possession, as distinguished from a mere trespass. Syn. 1 and 3. Potent, weighty, impressive, cogent, energetic, vigorous.

forcible-feeble (fôr'si-bl-fe-bl), a. and n. [< forcible + feeble, in allusion to one of Shakspeare's characters, named Feeble, whom Falstaff describes as "a valiant and a wrathful dove or most magnanimous mouse," . . . most forcible Feeble.] 2 Hen. IV., III. 12.] 1. a. Striving to be or appear strong or vigorous while being in reality feeble: as, a forcible-feeble style.

Epithets which are in the bad taste of the forcible-feeble school.
North British Rev.

II. n. A feeble person striving to appear strong or vigorous: usually said of a writer.

When the writer was of opinion he had made a point, you may be sure the hit was in italics, that last resource of the forcible-feeble.
Dumas.

forcibleness (fôr'si-bl-nes), n. The condition or quality of being forcible.

forcibly (fôr'si-bl-i), adv. In a forcible manner; by force; strongly; energetically; impressively.

The proud control of fierce and bloody war,
To enforce these rights so forcibly withheld.
Shak., K. John, I. 1.

But, of the objects which I have endeavored to describe, none arrested my attention so forcibly as two others.
Barnum, Ingoldby Legends, I. 180.

No man can express his convictions more forcibly than by acting upon them in a great and solemn matter of national importance.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 232.

forcing (fôr'sing), n. [< ME. forsyng, verbal n. of force¹, v.] 1. In hort., the art or practice of raising plants by artificial heat, at a season earlier than the natural one.

Portuguese gardeners are about the very worst and most ignorant in the civilized world, . . . knowing almost nothing of potting, and soils, and cuttings, and grafts, and forcing, and the management of glass.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 311.

2. In gun., the act of making a bullet take the groove of a rifle.

forcing-house (fôr'sing-hous), n. In hort., a hothouse for forcing plants.

forcing-pit (fôr'sing-pit), n. A pit of wood or masonry, sunk in the earth, for containing fermenting materials to produce bottom-heat in forcing plants.

forcing-pump (fôr'sing-pump), n. Same as force-pump.

forçipalt (fôr'si-pal), a. [< L. forceps (forçip-), forceps, + -al.] Of the nature of forceps.

Mechanics made use hereof in forçipalt organs, and instruments of incision. Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, II.

Fore and aft. new affl.

II. n. 1. A fore-and-aft rigged vessel.—2. A small cap with vizors before and behind. Also called stomper-cap.

On the platform were crowds of men in conventional tweed knickerbockers and Norfolk jackets, and women in jockey caps and fore-and-afts.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 494.

fore-annet (fôr-a-nent'), prep. [Also fore-nent, forment (and with addition fore-nent, etc.; see fore-nent); < for + anent, q. v.] Over against; opposite to.

Utheris inhabiting the barbarous fore-annet England.
Acts James VI., c. 227 (1594).

There is no foreign land; it is the traveller only that is foreign.

R. L. Stevenson, Silverado Squatters, p. 114.

[In law, for certain purposes, chiefly in the determination of private rights in a case of conflict of laws, the legislation and the judicial decisions of any one of the United States are commonly spoken of as foreign with respect to the other States, especially as regards matters not within the jurisdiction of the national government. Thus, in each State corporations formed under the law of any other State are termed foreign corporations. On the other hand, as commerce is subject to regulation by Congress, the term foreign port, when used in reference to such commerce, implies a port outside of the United States; when used, however, in reference to a State law giving a lien upon shipping, it may also mean a port of any other State.]

3. Relating to or connected with another country or other countries; pertaining to external relations or jurisdiction: as, foreign diplomacy; a foreign minister; the department of foreign affairs in a government.—4. Being in a place other than its own; not naturally connected with its surroundings, specifically said of an object, as a bullet or any material, present in a part of the body or in any other situation which is normally free from such intrusion. Thus, sand in the eye, or a splinter or dead bone in the flesh, is foreign matter or a foreign body.

When a bullet, or other foreign substance, is lodged in the flesh, the vital powers go to work and build up a little wall around it.

J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, IV, 1.

5. Not belonging (to); not connected (with); extraneous; irrelevant; not to the purpose: with to, or sometimes from: as, the sentiments you express are foreign to your heart; this design is foreign from my thoughts.

He never quits his Simile till it rises to some very great idea, which is often foreign to the occasion which gave birth to it.

Addams, Spectator, No. 308.

This innovation by means of the Episode . . . was for- ign to the intention of the Chorus.

Goldsmith, Origin of Poetry.

6. Excluded; not admitted; held at a distance. [Rare.]

forest (fôr'est), n. and a. [Early med. E. also forrest; < ME. forest, < OF. forest, F. forêt = Fr. forest, foresta = Sp. Pg. foresta (simulating Sp. Pg. flor, flower) = It. foresta = MHG. forest, forest, and prob. OHG. forst, MHG. forst, U. forst = Dan. forst (in comp.), although some German writers patriotically attempt to connect this form with OHG. foraha, forha, MHG. forhe, U. fähre = E. fir), < ML. foresta, foresta, L. forestum, forastum, n. forests and forastus, m. a forest, prop. a forest or space of ground over which the rights of the chase were reserved; sometimes distinguished as an open wood, as opposed to parcs, an inclosed wood, a park (cf. frith in both senses). ML. foresta also means a private fish-pond or fishing-place; in both senses it appears to involve the notion of interdiction (as regards cultivation or common use); cf. ML. forstare, proscribe, put under ban, lit. put outside or apart; ML. L.L. forasticus, out of doors, public, ML. forastrius, strange, foreign, outside; all < L. foris, foras, outside, out of doors: see foreign.] 1. n. 1. A tract of land covered with trees; a wood, usually one of considerable extent; a tract of woodland with or without inclosed intervals of open and uncultivated ground.

Ettrick Forest is a fair forest,
In it grows made a semelle tree.
Song of the Outlaw Murray (Child's Ballads, VI, 22).
This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks . . .
Stand like harpers hoar, with beards that rest on their bosoms.
Longfellow, Evangeline, Prol.

2. In Great Britain, a designation still retained for some large tracts of land or districts formerly but not now covered with trees or constituting royal forests (see below), especially such as have some of the distinctive characteristics or uses of wild or broken woodland, as the Forest of Dean in England or some of the deer-forests of Scotland.

We have many forests in England without a stick of timber upon them. Wetwood, Dict. Eng. Etymology.

3. In Eng. law, and formerly also in Scots law, a territory of woody grounds and pastures privileged for wild beasts and fowls of chase and warren to rest and abide in, generally belonging to the sovereign, and set apart for his recreation, or granted by him to others, under special laws, and having officers specially appointed to look after it; a hunting-preserve maintained at public expense for royal or aristocratic use; specifically called a royal forest. Such forests were once very numerous, and often of great extent; but most of them have been disafforested, and those still kept up are now chiefly used as public pleasure-grounds.

Forests are waste grounds belonging to the king, replenished with all manner of chase or venery, which are under the king's protection, for the sake of his recreation and delight.
Blackstone, Com., i. viii.

It may happen that the wastes of two or more manors adjoin, and sometimes the common, or moor, or what ever it may be called, is a royal forest—that is, a hunting preserve created since the Conquest. The presence of trees, I need hardly say, is not required to make a forest in this sense. The great mark of it is the absence of enclosures.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 40.

Charter of the Forest. See charter. Drift of the forest. See drift. Forest-bed group. In Eng. geol., a division of the so-called cray (which see). It is but a few feet in thickness, but is exposed for many miles along the coast of Norfolk. It contains a great variety of organic remains, among which are cones of trees, leaves of various plants, land-shells, and bones of mammals, birds, and reptiles. Ordinance of the forest. See ordinance.

Pure forest. A forest consisting wholly of one kind of trees: in contradistinction to a mixed forest, in which the trees are of several kinds. Right of forest. the right or franchise of keeping, for the purpose of venery and warren, all animals pursued in field sports in a certain territory or product of woody ground and pasture. Submarine forest. a geological phrase applied to beds of impure peat, consisting of roots, stems, and branches of trees, etc., occupying the sites on which they grew, but which by change of level are now submerged by the sea. Such submarine forests do not contain any trees that are not found growing at the present time. They belong to the recent or Quaternary period, and occur above the boulder-clay. They have been traced for several miles along the margins of the estuaries on the north and south shores of the county of Fife in Scotland. Syn. Forest, Wood, Woods, Woodland, Grove, Chase, Park. Of some of these words the earlier and the later use differ very much. Forest implies a large body of trees growing naturally, or the tract considered as covered with trees. It formerly always implied the presence of animals of the chase. Wood or woods is like forest, except in being smaller. Woodland differs from woods in emphasizing the land or tract upon which the trees stand. A grove is a cluster of trees not sufficiently extensive to be called a wood. A chase is, in strictness, open woods of indefinite extent, especially set apart for hunting, but the word survives as applied to places from which the animals have disappeared. A park is primarily an inclosure of considerable size; the word is now often applied to a piece of land set apart for public recreation and more or less elaborately adapted by art to that end, as Regent's Park in London and Central Park in New York.

He [William the Conqueror] ordered whole villages and towns to be swept away to make forests for the deer. Not satisfied with sixty-eight royal forests, he laid waste an immense district to form another in Hampshire, called the New Forest.
Jacobs, Child's Hist. Eng., viii.

Like the leaves of the forest, when summer is green,
That host, with their banners, at sunset were seen.
Byron, Destruction of Sennacherib.

A terrace walk, and half a rood
Of land, set out to plant a wood.
Swift, tr. of Horace's Satires, vi.
There is a pleasure in the pathless woods;
Byron, Child's Harold, iv. 178.

Over the woodlands brown and bare, . . .
Silent, and soft, and slow
Descends the snow. Longfellow, Snowflakes.

A copse in which the Wood-nymphs shrove;
(No wood) it rather seems a grove.
Shak., Cephalus and Procris (Poems, ed. 1640).

Then cross the common into Darnley about To show Sir Arthur's deer. Tennyson, The Brook.
You have fed upon my sagacious,
Disparke'd my parks, and fell'd my forest woods.
Shak., Rich. II., iii. 1.

II. a. Pertaining or relating to forests; syn.: as, forest law.

It will be found that all forest and game laws were introduced into Europe at the same time and by the same policy as gave birth to the feudal system.
Blackstone, Com., ii. xxvii.

Forest court, devil oak, etc. See the nouns. Forest law, the old English system of law (now obsolete in its most characteristic features) under which royal forests were preserved and extended.

In the new forests were exercised the most horrid tyrannies and oppressions under colour of forest law.
Blackstone.

It was with the utmost reluctance that the clergy admitted the declaration of the legate Hugo Pierleoni, that the king might arrest and punish clerical offenders against the forest law.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 202.

Forest liberties, a phrase sometimes used to designate grants by the crown to subjects, conferring a right to the enjoyment of privileges in a royal forest or to afford waste lands; also the privilege so granted.

forest (fôr'est), v. t. [= ML. forestare, convert into a forest; from the noun. Cf. afforest, disforest.] To cover with trees or wood; afforest.

An ugly serpent, which forestall'd their way.
Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, xv. 47.

3. To diminish; deprive by something preceding.

This Council of the Lord Howard his Father followed; and King James, perceiving what their Meaning was thought it stood not with his Honour to be fore-stalled out of his own Realm.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 220.

May
This night forestall him of the coming day.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 5.

4. To take or bring forth in advance of something or somebody else; hinder by preoccupation or prevention; anticipate; prevent or counteract beforehand.

The reason that the Latin Tongue found not such Entertainment in the Oriental Parts was that the Greek had fore-stalled her.
Howell, Letters, ii. 62.

Whenever governments have undertaken to educate, it has been with the view of forestalling that spontaneous education which threatened their own supremacy.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 373.

To some extent they [certain historians] are attempts to forestall the opinion of posterity.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 56.

In the eastern part of the north aisle, the imagination of Jonathan or Pantaleon has forestalled somewhat of the Dantesque conception of the Inferno.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 331.

To forestall the market, to take an undue advantage in trade, to the injury of a free market, by buying up the whole stock or a controlling share of some kind of merchandise, with the intention of selling it again for more than the just price; or to dissuade persons from bringing their goods to that market, or to persuade them to enhance the price when there.

O, sir, have I forestalled your honest market?
R. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 2.

=Syn. To monopolize, engross, preoccupy.

law: (a) The seizure and rescue of stolen or lost property, particularly cattle, from the thief or from persons having illegal possession. (b) The reward fixed for such seizure or rescue.

forfang², n. [The sense defined rests on an entry in Spelman: Fleta has forfang in sense of 'forestalling'; but the word does not occur in the AS. laws in this sense, which appears to be due to a misunderstanding of *forfang*¹, taken, as it is in a Latin version of the AS.
laws, in the sense 'preventive vel anticipatio', a taking before, < AS. forfan (pret. forfeng, pp. forfangen), anticipate, *< fore, before, +

3. The act of fabricating or producing falsely; the making of a thing in imitation of another thing, as a legal document, commercial paper or coin, a literary production, a work of art, a natural object, etc., with a view to deceive, mislead, or defraud; specifically, the act of fraudulently making, counterfeiting, or altering any record, instrument, register, note, or the like, to the prejudice of the right of another; as, the forgery of a check or a bond. In criminal law it denotes (at common law) a false making of any instrument by which one person can become obligated to another (including every alteration of or addition to a true instrument), with criminal intent, for purposes of fraud and deceit, the making or altering a writing so as to make the alteration or the writing purport to be the act of some person whose act it is not; the false making of an instrument which purports to be that which it is not, as distinguished from an instrument which purports to be what it really is, but contains false statements. The definition is much enlarged by various statutes in different jurisdictions, under which many acts not originally forgery are punishable as such. See counterfeit, n., 2.

In war he practised the same art that he had seen so successful to Marius, of raising a kind of enthusiasm and contempt of danger in his army by the forgery of auspices and divine admonitions. C. Middleton, Cicero, l. 141.

Forgery may with us be defined (at common law) to be "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right."

Blackstone, Com., IV. xvii.

4. That which is forged, fabricated, falsely or fraudulently devised, or counterfeited; any instrument which fraudulently purports to be that which it is not.

These are but forgeries.

But toys, but tales, but dreams, deceits, and lies form (fôr'm), n. [Early mod. E. also fourm, fourme; *< ME. formus, fourme, fourme, furme, shape, figure, manner, bench, frame, seat, condition, agreement, etc., < OF. forme, fourme, furme, F. forme = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. forma = D. vorm = MHG. forme, G. form = Icel. formr = Dan. Sw. form, < L. forma, shape, figure, image, outline, plan, mold, frame, case, etc., manner, sort, kind, etc., ML. also a bench, choir-stall, grade in a school, etc. (with many other meanings). There is no ground for the attempted distinction, in pronunciation and spelling, between form, shape, etc., and form (spelled fourm in Bailey), a bench, etc.] 1. The external shape or configuration of a body; the figure, as defined by lines and surfaces; external appearance considered independently of color or material; in an absolute use, the human figure; as, it was in the form of a circle; a triangular form; the form of the head or of the body; a beautiful or an ugly form.*

The apparent permanence in the case of the rock or tree is a temporarily abiding form or temporarily abiding special relations.
J. Perquasson, Hist. Arch., I. 204.

2. Specifically, in crystal, the complex of planes included under the same general symbol. Thus in the isometric system the most general form is the hexoctahedron, embracing forty-eight similar planes. In the triclinic system a form, even in the most general case, includes only two similar planes, and is called an open form, since it does not represent an enclosed solid or closed form; similarly, the two basal planes in the orthorhombic system constitute a form.

3. Attractive appearance; shapeliness; beauty. [Archaic.]

He hath no form nor comeliness. Isa. lvi. 2.

4. A costume; a special dress; as, a blue silk form.

There comes out of the chaire room Mrs. Stewart in a most lovely form, with her hair all about her ears, having her picture taking there.
Pope, Diary, II. 145.

5. A mold, pattern, or model; something to give shape, or on or after which things are fashioned; as, a hatters' or a milliners' form; a form for jelly. — 6. In printing, an assemblage of types secured in a chase for stereotyping, or of either types or plates for printing. A form may consist of one page or of many pages. For stereotyping, no particular order of arrangement is necessary, for printing, the pages are arranged in such order that in folding the printed sheet they will fall in regular sequence. In book-printing, before the general use of steam-presses, two forms (see inner and outer form, below) were usually required for a sheet, one being separately printed on each side, now a single form frequently comprises a whole sheet, the paper being turned end for end in printing the second side. Large newspapers, however, still require two forms. In this sense often spelled forme in Great Britain.

7. In milit. engin., same as gabion-form. See gabion. — 8. In general arrangement of or relationship between the parts of anything, as distinguished from the parts themselves; opposed to matter, but not properly to substance (unless it be the intention of the writer to identify substance with matter). Thus, to say that the soul was immaterial was formerly considered the same as to say that it was a form. With the older writers form is often synonymous with essence, and has generally lofty associations (thus, the shape of a living being considered as its perfection, was called its form, while that of a lifeless thing was called its figure, but not its form); and these ideas cling to the word in the minds of later writers, as Kant. But with many modern writers the notion of form is something imposed upon the thing itself, without, and distinct from its life and essence. In fact, form denotes a determination, a specializing element, that is constitutive of a thing by virtue of which it is the kind of thing that it is. In the Platonic philosophy the form is the exemplar according to which a thing is made or the mold, as it were, in which the thing is cast. In the Aristotelian philosophy form is the developed actuality, matter the undeveloped potentiality; matter is that element by virtue of which the thing is, form is that by which it is as it is, that is, the nature or essence of the thing. In Bacon's philosophy the true form is the physical structure or constitution of anything. In Kant's philosophy form is that element of an object which is imported into it by the mind, opposed to the matter, which is given in sense. For various other metaphysical applications of the term, see phrases below.

The figure comprehends in the shape of things that have no life, as the fashion of the elements of trees, of flowers, of an house, a ship, a coat, and so on like. The fourme comprehendeth the portraiture of all living things, as the very lively image of man, of an house, of a lion, as we call a man well favoured or hard favoured.
Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason (1611).

Though I shall for brevity sake, when the word form, yet I would be understood to mean by it not a real substance distinct from matter, but only the matter itself of a natural body, considered with its peculiar manner of existence, which I think may not inconveniently be called either its special or denominating state, or its essential modification, or, if you would have me express it in one word, its stamp.
Boyle, Origin of Forms.

Of a beautiful landscape, not only as poem, the blending of unity with variety appears not only in the grouping of some elements, form in the narrow meaning; but also in that of the representative content of signification of these.
J. Sully, Outline of Psychology, p. 236.

In a phenomenon, I call that which corresponds to the sensation it makes, but that which appears the manifold matter of the phenomenon to be perceived as arranged in a certain order I call its form.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. by Max Müller), p. 1.
The distinction between form and matter is employed by Aristotle in his exposition of the metaphysics. The soul belongs to the category of substance or essence, and that of quantity, quality, etc., but of the two points of view under which essence may be presented the soul ranks with form, not with matter — with the actual, not with the potential.
Grege, Aristotle, p. 467.

Time and space are not given in sensation. They are not the sensational matter of perception, but something that makes it possible for us to represent all parts of that matter as arranged in certain relations to one another; and this we may fairly call the form of perception.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 224.

9. A specific formation or arrangement; characteristic structure, constitution, or appearance; disposition of parts or conditions.

When the Duke heard that in the same forme he must come a-gayn, he vnderstode welle he shoulde bringe with hym ygerme.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), I. 69.

To laugh at all things thou shalt heare is neither good nor fit.

It shewes the property and forme of one with little wit.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 294.

Who, being in the forme of God, . . . took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men.
Phil. ii. 6, 7.

Ford, Love's Sacrifice, I. 1.

14. Conformity to the conventionalities and usages of society; propriety; chiefly in the phrases good form, bad form.

We'll eat the dinner and have a dance together, or we shall transgress all form. Steele, Tender Husband, v. 1.
I would see the harem bride decked in the robe of culture, jewelled with the gems of refinement, and adorned with the lace entwined veil of good form.
Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 636.

15. Mere appearance; semblance.

Why keep up a form of separation when the life of it is fled?
Lamb, Imperfect Symphonies.

16. High condition or fitness for any undertaking, as a competition, especially a physical competition; powers of competing.

In the language of the turf, when we say that a horse is in form, we intend to convey to our hearers that he is in high condition and fit to run. So, again, the word is used in still another sense, for we speak of a horse's form when we wish to allude to his powers on the turf, as compared with other well-known animals. Thus if it be supposed that two three-year-olds, carrying the same weight, would run a mile and a half, and come in abreast, it is said the form of one is equal to that of the other.
J. H. Walsh, The Horse, v.

17. In alg., a quantity in which the variable are considered abstractly with reference only to their mathematical relations in the quadratic, and apart from any signification. — 18. Gram., a word bearing the sign of a distinct grammatical character, or denoted by its structure as having a particular office. — 19. In music: (a) The general theory or science of arranging themes, tonalities, phrases, and sections in a piece that order, symmetry, and relation of parts may be secured: one of the most important branches of the art of composition. (b) The particular rhythmical, melodic, or harmonic disposition or arrangement of tones in a phrase, section, or movement, especially when distinct and regular enough to be known by a special name, as the sonata-form, the rondo-form, etc.—20. A blank or schedule to be filled out by the insertion of details; a sample or specimen document calculated to serve as a guide in framing others in like cases: as, a form for a deed, lease, or contract.

You'll memorialize that Department (according to regular forms that you'll find out) for leave to memorialize this Department. You had better take a lot of forms away with you. Give him a lot of forms!

Dickens, Little Dorrit, x.

21. A long sent; a bunch.

The Duke, upon hearing it, leaps from the Table so hastily that he hurt both his shins on the Form.

Baker, Chronicle, p. 130.

I was seen . . . sitting with her upon the form.

22. (a) A number of pupils sitting together on a bench at school. (b) A class or rank of students in a school (especially in England).

Preaching the same Sermon to all sorts of People is as if a School Master should read the same Lesson to his several Formes.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 93.

The lower fourth form in which Tom found himself at the beginning of the next half-year was the largest form in the lower school, and numbered upwards of forty boys.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 8.

Hence—(c) A class or rank in society.—23. The seat or bed of a hare.

Now for a bed like hare in form they peer.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, i.

The hares (Lepus Americanus) were very familiar. One had her form under my house all winter, separated from me only by the flooring.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 301.

24. A particular species or kind; a species of a genus, etc.; any assemblage of similar things constituting a component of a group, especially of a zoological group.

Practically, when a naturalist can make two forms together by others having intermediate characters, he treats the one as a variety of the other, ranking the most common, but sometimes the one first described, as the species, and the other as the variety.

Huxley, Origin of Species, p. 50.

We must also remember that many slight characters may be the atrophied or rudimentary remains of more important characters which were useful in some ancestral form.

A. R. Wallace, in Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XI, 395.

Absolute form, in metaph., form considered, or being, without matter. Accidental form, in metaph., a form which constitutes not the substance of a thing, but a mere accident of it. Adjoint linear form, in math., a linear function having the same factors as the quantity to which it belongs, and its coefficients both terminate.

Algebraic form. See def. 17. Assistant form, in metaph., a form which makes no part of the subject, but serves only to impart motion to it. Bad, binary, canonical, conditional, etc. form. See the adjectives.

Blank form. (a) A printed paper in which spaces are left blank to be filled up according to particular requirements. Such forms are very extensively used in legal and business transactions. (b) In printing, a form of types in which a page or several pages have been left blank.

Calculus of forms. See calculus. Continuity of forms. See continuity. Contract forms. See contract. Corporal form, a form which not only inheres in bodies but has in itself a bodily character. Degenerate form. See degenerate. Disponent of disposing form. See disponent. Divisor of a form. See divisor. External form of reasoning. See external. Form of action, in law, the distinguishing method of procedure, and hence the class to which an action belongs, considered with reference to the mode of procedure or the kind of relief sought. Form of a proposition, the mode of relationship which it asserts between its terms; also, the logical type or class to which the proposition belongs; also, with older writers, the copula as distinguished from the subject and the predicate. Form of cognition, the mode in which anything is cognized, especially, in the Kantian philosophy, that by which any kind of synthesis of representations is effected, being either a form of intuition (space and time), of the understanding; (a Kantian category), or of the reason (a Kantian idea). Form of Concord. See concord. Form of corporeity, in metaph., that in which the bodily character of a thing is determined. Form of forms, in metaph., the idea which determines the ideas themselves; the one, also, the nous of Plotinus.

Arise, climb, ascend, and mount up (with speculative wines) in spirit, to behold in the glass of creation the form of forms, the exemplar number of all things numerable, both visible and invisible, mortal and immortal, corporal and spiritual.

Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1620)

The soul may be called the form of forms.

Bacon, Physical Tables, II., Expt.

Form value. See value. Good form. See def. 14. Ground form. See ground. Immaterial form, in metaph., a form the efficient cause of which does not lie in matter; opposed to material form. Informing form, in metaph., a form which is a part of its subject. Inherent form, in metaph., a form which can exist only in matter. Inner form, in printing, when two forms are used for one sheet, the form which contains the pages that are hidden or concealed by the folds or bolts in an uncut sheet. This form is usually printed first.—Intelligible form, in metaph., a form which can be perceived only by the intellect.—Outer form, in printing, when two forms are required, the form which contains the first and last pages of a signature, as 1 and 8 in a sheet of octavo, or 1 and 16 in a sheet of folio, and the pages which therefore appear on the outside of the folded sheet. Usually this side of the sheet is printed last.—Principal form, in metaph., a form which itself constitutes a species; opposed to a disponent or disposing form, which merely prepares the matter for the reception of the principal form.—Ribbed form, in hand paper-making, a square or oblong wooden frame with parallel brass wires stretched by cross-wires, used for making flood paper.—Sensible form, in metaph., a form which can be perceived by the senses.—Separate form, in metaph., a form which, while it may be capable of existing only in matter, yet has a being apart from the matter.—Simple form, in metaph., mere form, without matter; thus, God is held to be simple form. Substantial or essential form, in metaph., that in which the essence of a thing consists. The substantial form has four marks: it does not directly affect the senses; it has no variations of degree (though this was disputed); it is good and perfect; it is the principle or origin of the properties and operations of that to which it pertains. Much use was made by the medieval logicians of the doctrine of substantial forms, and thus the absurdity of trying to explain the properties and operations of things by means of more abstract statements was put in a strong light, which the conflict with the real explanations of science soon heightened. Thus, if the Newtonian law of gravitation were merely a transformation of Kepler's laws, and implied nothing further, it would be of the nature of a substantial form; but in point of fact it predicts the various lunar equations, the planetary perturbations, the procession of the equinoxes, the tides, and the figure of the earth.—Theory of forms, the theory of the changes of algebraic forms due to linear transformations of their variables; especially, the theory of invariants, reciprocants, etc.—To take form, to assume a definite shape, appearance, or order; become definite and clear, as, the conception gradually took form in his mind.—Syn. 1. Shape, Fashion, etc. See figure, n. 13. Rite, Observance, etc. See ceremony.

Form (fôr'm), v. [Early mod. E. also fourm, fourme; < ME. formen, fourmen; < OF. former, fourmer; F. former = Pr. Sp. formar = It. formare = D. vormen = MHG. G. formen = Icel. Sw. forma = Dan. forme, < L. formari, shape, fashion, form, etc., < forma, a shape, form; see form, n.] 1. To give form to; shape; mold. (a) To give a figure to, make a figure of, constitute as a figure—as, to form a statue, to form a triangle.

That glorious picture of the air
Which summer's light robed angel forms
On the dark ground of fading storms.

Whittier, Mogg Megone, II.

(b) In general, to model, make, or produce by any combination of parts or materials.

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

Gen. ii. 7.

I'll trust you with the stuff you have to work on.
You'll form it!

L. Jonson, Catiline, iii. 3.

Prometheus, forming Mr. Day, Cares something like a Man in Clay.

Pope, The Parallel.

We can put together sentence after sentence of clear and strong English without a single Roman word, we cannot form the shortest really complete grammatical sentence without Teutonic words.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 160.

Specifically: (c) To arrange, combine in any particular manner; as, to form his troops into a hollow square. (d) To model by instruction and discipline; mold; train.

Endless men, living and dead, whom we will not stop to enumerate, carried to the Upper House an eloquence formed and matured in the lower.

Macaulay, Lord Holland

I resolved to form Doris's mind. I talked to her on the subjects which occupied my thoughts.

Dickens, David Copperfield, xlviii.

(e) To devise; conceive; frame; invent; create; as, to form opinions from sound premises; to form an image in the mind.

He said that he was unable to form an idea of what would be international bimetalism.

Contemporary Rev., L. 287.

We have now no means of forming an opinion of the great national temple of the Capitoline Jove, no trace of it, nor any intelligible description, having been preserved to the present time.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 305.

(f) In gram., to make, as a word, by derivation or by affixes.

The one class or conjugation regularly forms its preterit and participle . . . by the addition of "ed" or "d" to the root of the verb.

Whitney, Essentials of Eng. Grammar, p. 107.

2. To go to make up; be an element or constituent of; constitute; take the shape of; as, duplicity forms no part of his character; these facts form a safe foundation for our conclusions.

The diplomatic politicians, . . . who formed by far the majority.

Harle, A Regicide Peace, II.

He took his measures with that combination of dexterity and daring which formed his character.

Irving, Granada, p. 61.

3. To display so as to communicate the real meaning.

No violent heat whatever can form a new language to a man which he never knew before.

Stratford, Sermons, I. ix.

4. To persuade; bring to do.

The first that you formed to that false deed,
He should have hadde honeye on his on the fork.
Richard the Redeless, I. 103.

5. To provide with a form, as a hare. [Rare.]

The melancholy hare is form'd in brakes and briars.
Drayton, Polyolbion, II. 304.

—Syn. 1. To fashion, carve, produce, dispose.—2. To constitute, compose, make up.

II. intrans. 1. To take or come into form; assume the characteristic or implied figure, appearance, or arrangement: as, the troops formed in columns; ice forms at a temperature of 32° F.

Form: Form I. Elfenstein, form I.

Ready, be ready to meet the storm!

Tennyson, The War.

At the time of the English settlement in Britain, the consciousness of distinct national life could hardly have begun among the Nether-Dutch people; their language, their institutions, were still only forming, not yet formed.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 77.

2. To run for a form, as a hare; squat in a form.

Scath. First, think which way she fourmeth, on what wind;

Or north, or south.

George.

For, as the shepherd said,
A witch is a kind of hare. B. Jonson, Mad Shepherd, II. 2.

-form. [= F. forme = Sp. fig. It. forma, < L. -formis, -like, -shaped, the form, with adj. termination, in compound adjectives, of forma, shape, form; see form, n. The vowel preceding this termination (representing in Latin the stem-vowel of the preceding element) is properly i; but in some scientific words recently formed the vowel is erroneously made a, as if the ending of the Latin feminine genitive.] A termination in words of Latin origin, or in words formed like them, meaning 'like, -shaped, in the form of': as, ensiform, sword-like, sword-shaped; falciform, sickle-shaped; verruiform, worm-like; oviform, in the form of an egg.

formable (fôr'ma-bl), a. [= F. formable = Sp. formable = It. formabile, capable of being formed, < L. formabilis, that may be formed, < formare, form; see form, v.] 1. (Capable of being formed.

A good many of his nervous connections are not yet formed, they are only formable.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 312.

According to form, rule, or established order; according to the rules of law or custom; systematic; regular; legal.

The tide of blood in me
Hath proudly flow'd in vanity, till now
Now doth it turn and ebb back to the sea;
Where it shall mingle with the state of floods,
And flow henceforth in formal majesty.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 2.

It was agreed that there should be a formal disputation between these doctors and some Protestant clergymen.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

Clive . . . applied to the Court of Delhi for a formal grant of the powers of which he already possessed the reality.

Macaulay, Lord Clive.

In northern Gaul, above all, where the Franks accepted, not only Christianity but Catholic Christianity, in the very act of their coming, the Teutonic conquest can hardly be said to have made any change at all in the formal position of the Christian Church.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 111.

2. Characterized by or made or done in strict or undue conformity to legal or conventional rules; notably conventional.

And then, the justice;
In fair round belly, with good capon lin'd,
With eyes severe, and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances.

Shak., As you Like It, II. 2.

Especially [ceremonies] be not to be omitted to strangers and formal nature.

Bacon, Essays, III.

Form. What is he, Blaudello?
 Bion. Master, a mercantile, or a pedant,
 I know not what; but formal in apparel,
 In gait and countenance surely like a father.

Shak., T. of the 8., iv. 2.

The Moors' lives are extremely formal and regular in their social manners. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptiana, i. 250.

Formal as she was, still, in her life's experience, she had gnashed her teeth against human law.

Hartshorne, Seven Gables, v.

4. Regular or methodical in action. [Rare.]

The formal stars do travel so

As we their names and courses know. Waller.

5. Having conformity with the rules of art; scholastic; theoretical; also, rhetorical; academical; expressed in artificial language.

Here is taxed the vanity of formal speakers, that study more about prefaces and inducements than upon the conclusions and issues of speech.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 314.

I began to look to the rudiments of music, in which I afterwards arrived to some formal knowledge, though to small perfection of hand. Ervelyn, Diary, 1639.

He fayed such a formal excuse that for want of language Captain Winne understood him not rightly.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, i. 223.

6. Relating to form merely, not to the substance or matter; having the form or appearance without the substance or essence; external; outward; as, a formal defect; formal duty; formal worship.

Let not our looks put on our purposes,
 But bear it as our Roman actors do,
 With untired spirits and formal constancy.

Shak., J. C., ii. 1.

Of formal duty make no more thy boast,
 Thou dost obey at where it concerns me most.

Dryden, Amengrebe.

7. Embodied in a form; personified. The allusion in the extract is to the character of the Vice who, under many aliases, was an attendant on the Devil in the old morality.

Thus, like the formal Vice, Iniquity,
 I moralise two meanings in one word.

Shak., Rich. III. iii. 1.

8. Pertaining to or regarding the shape and appearance of a living being; characteristic; proper; sane.

The consequence is then, thy jealous fits
 Have scared thy husband from the use of wits,
 He patient, for I will not let him stir Till I have used the approved means I have,
 With wholesome syrups, drugs, and holy prayers,
 To make of him a formal man again.

Shak., C. of F., v. 1.

This is evident to any formal capacity.

Shak., T. N., ii. 5.

9. Pertaining to form, in sense 8, especially in the Aristotelian use, opposed to material; essential; express. See phrases below.—10. Pertaining to those elements of cognition which according to Kant have their origin in the nature of the mind itself; universal and necessary.—Formal abstraction. See abstraction.—Formal acceptance, the acceptance of a word as representing what it signifies. Thus, if we say "Man has three letters," man is taken in its material acceptance; but if we say "Man is an animal," the acceptance is formal.—Formal appellation, the mode in which an adjective is understood when it forms the predicate of a proposition.—Formal beatitude. See beatitude.—Formal cause, in metaph., that element of a thing which determines what sort of a thing it is.—Formal correctness, evidence, heresy, etc. See the nouns.—Formal criterion of truth. See criterion.—Formal inclusion, in logic, express inclusion, such that the including term could not be defined without giving a definition of part of the definition of the term included.—Formal induction, an inference having the form of an induction, but differing essentially therefrom in being demonstrative; complete induction.—Formal law, in logic, an explicit law, also, one which has no exceptions.—Formal logic, the theory of the relations of different forms of propositions and syllogisms; also (by loose writers) applied to the opinion of those who hold that such logic is adequate to representing human thought.

The doctrine which expounds the laws by which our scientific procedure should be governed, in so far as these lie in the forms of thought, or in the conditions of the mind itself, which is the subject in which knowledge inheres, this science may be called formal or subjective, or abstract, or pure, logic. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, App. i.

Pure or formal logic is devoted to thought in general and those universal forms and principles of thought which hold good everywhere, both in judging of reality and weighing possibility, irrespective of any difference in the objects. Loge, Logic (trans. ed. Bouanquet) Int. xi.

Formal mode, a mode which affects the copula of a proposition, as possibility, necessity, etc., contrasted with a material mode, which is any kind of limitation or modification of the subject or predicate.—Formal nature, the essence of a thing, the universal in it.—Formal object of a faculty, the adequate object, the object expressed with sufficient generality to include every special object and nothing else.—Formal object of sight, but blue or red a material object.—Formal object of a science, the adequate object, as considered by the science; that which includes all that the science treats and nothing else.—Formal opposition, an opposition between two propositions which appear to directly conflict, apart from any explanation of the meanings of the terms: as, No A is B; All A is B.—Formal part, in logic, the genus or specific difference considered as part of the species.—Formal repugnancy, the repugnancy of two characters which cannot be true of the same subject, as black and white.—Formal sign, in logic, a sign which denotes its object by virtue of resembling it; a likeness; an icon; an analogue; a diagram.

The formal sign is that which represents the thing. So, a picture is a sign of the thing painted, the footstep, of the foot; conceptions, of things, etc.

Burgesdicus, Moutin Logica (tr. by a gentleman), ii. 16, 20.

Formal significance, the quality connected by an adjective. Formal signification, the regular signification of a word.—Formal truth, logical consistency; agreement with logical possibility.

The knowledge of the form of thought is a formal knowledge, and the harmony of thought with the form of thought is, consequently, formal truth.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xxvi.

Formal unity, in metaph., the unity which belongs to an individual apart from his individuality. Thus, the humanity of Peter, apart from his individuality as Peter (Petrity), is one humanity, and in so far as possible formal unity.—Formal whole, in logic, a species considered as composed of its genus and specific difference.—Syn. 3. Ceremonial, etc. (see ceremonious), punctilious, stiff, prim.

formaldehyde (fôr-mal'dê-hîd), n. [fôr-mal (acc.) + aldehyde.] A gas, CH₂O. It can be obtained in several ways, as, for example, by leading a mixture of vapor of methyl-alcohol, CH₃O, and air over a heated platinum spiral. When dissolved in water it is a powerful disinfectant.

1. The character of being formal; strict adherence to or observance of prescribed or recognized form, rule, style, etiquette, or the like; excessive attachment to conventional usage, or (especially in religion) to external forms and observances; hence, artificiality or cold stiffness of manner or behavior; as, judicial formalism; formalism in art; the formalism of pedantry or of court life; cold formalism in public worship.

This practice of asserting simply on authority, with the pretence and without the reality of assent, is what is meant by formalism. J. H. Newman, Grammar of Assent, p. 41.

One good result had followed the constitutional formalism of the three reigns. Stables, Const. Hist., i. 378.

2. In philos.: (a) The system which denies the existence of matter and recognizes form only; phenomenal idealism. (b) A belief in the sufficiency of formal logic, especially of the traditional syllogistic, for the purposes of human thought.

formalist (fôr-mal-ist), n. [fôr-mal, Sw. formalist, < F. formaliste = Pg. formalista; as formal + -ist.] 1. One who adheres strictly to established custom, form, or usage, as in style, conduct, or procedure; one who is attached to the observance of recognized modes or methods; also, one who has undue regard to forms and rules.

There are in point of wisdom and sufficiency, that do nothing or little worth solemnly. It is a ridiculous thing, and fit for a satire to persons of judgement, to see what shifts these formalists have, and what perspectives to make superfluous to seeme body, that both depth and bulke. Bacon, Of Seeming Wise (1612).

The cramping influence of a hard formalist on a young child in repressing his spirits and courage, paralyzing his understanding, . . . is a familiar fact explained to the child when he becomes a man. Emerson, History.

2. In philos., one who denies the existence of matter and recognizes the existence of form only; an idealist.

formalistic (fôr-mal-ist'ik), a. [fôr-mal-ist + -ic.] Characterized by formalism.

To make forms essential is the essence of formalistic ritualism. C. Hodges, quoted in Church Polity, p. 267.

formality (fôr-mal'i-ti), n.; pl. formalities (-tiz). [fôr-mal-ist = Sp. formalidad = Pg. formalidade = It. formalità, as formal + -ity.] 1. The condition or quality of being formal; specifically, rigid or undue observance of form or established rules, as in style, conduct, or procedure; especially, the sacrifice of substance or spirit to form; conventionalism.

Not was his attention on dress, or on a matter of formality and custom, but of substance. Ep. Atterbury.

His heart was a better school. . . . His manners, decorations even to formality. Macaulay, William Pitt.

2. The result of exclusive attention to the rules of art, without life or spontaneity.

such thoughts as are not produced on material, so that if you look on them you look through them. Coleridge.

3. An established order; a rule of proceeding; a formal mode or method; as, the formalities of judicial process; formalities of law.

The only part of the formalities which he seemed to distrust him was the plucking of the Bible out of his hand.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

Land once affected became subject to a peculiar system of laws, which, as well as the formalities required to constitute a valid affectment, have been carefully ascertained by the Anglo-Norman lawyers. Encyc. Brit., ix. 408.

4. Validity; binding force.

The formality of the vow lies in the promise made to God. Stillingfleet.

5. Customary behavior or dress, or customary ceremony; ceremonial.

Civilians . . . attired in black gowms, with certain tippets and formalities that they wear upon pleading days. Coryat, Crudities, i. 31.

The pretender would have infallibly landed in our northern parts, and found them all set down in their formalities, as the Gauls did the Roman senators. Swift.

6. In philos., external appearance; formal part.

To fix on God the formality of faculties or affections is the imposture of our fancies, and contradictory to his divinity. Chambrille, Socy Sci.

7. In the philosophy of Duns Scotus, a formal element of being; a quidditative ens, or anything belonging thereto except an intrinsic mode. Examples of formalities are: humanity, actuality, animality, quantity, quality, entity, unity, truth, goodness. Examples of intrinsic modes are: infinity, potentiality, necessity, existence, reality, essence.

Its parts are said to be formal, as if one should say, which by reason only, which they call formality, are distinguished.

Burgesdicus, Moutin Logica (tr. by a gentleman), ii. 14, 16.

8. The character of the formal in the Kantian sense; universality and necessity.

formalize (fôr-mal-iz), v.; pret. and pp. formalized, ppr. formalizing. [fôr-mal-iz = Sp. formalizar = Pg. formalizar = It. formalizzare, as formal + -ize.] 1. trans. 1. To reduce to form; give a certain form to; model.

The same spirit which animated the blessed soul of our Saviour Christ doth so formalize, unite, and actuate his whole race, as if both he and they were so many limbs computed into one body. Hooker.

2. To render formal.

It is curious to see the agency of this [importance attached to] gentility in formalizing even love and hatred. Whipple, Lit. and Life, p. 187.

II. intrans. 1. To affect formality; become formal. [Rare.]

They turned their poor cottages into stately palaces, then true fasting into formalizing and partial abstinence. Hales, St. Peter's Fall.

2. To use forms, as of statement.

Many times indeed our gallants can formalize in other words, but evermore the substance, and usually the very words are no other but those of Calix's, Let us go out into the field. Hales, Duels.

formalizer (fôr-mal-iz-er), n. A formalist.

The ministers turned formalizers. Roger North, Lord Guilford, ii. 144.

O where hast thou been so long hyde in mouns,
 That canst so wel and formeliche argue?

Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 497.

You and your followers do stand formally divided against the authorized guides of the church and the rest of the people. Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

A judgment is formally right when its predicate is contained in the conception of the subject; formally wrong when it is not. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 206.

The true principle formally stated by Butler that "probability is the guide of life." Belshazzar's Feast, xlv. 711.

The very devil assumed their formality,
 That face, that voice, that gesture, that attire.

Middleton, A Mad World

[In the Scottish philosophy this adverb was introduced into a proposition to show that it was true by virtue of a definition, or 'identically']

The effect is said to be contained in the cause either formally or causally. When formally, the effect is of the same nature with the cause, the cause is said to be universal, and is equal to its effect.

Burgesdicus, Moutin Logica (tr. by a gentleman), ii. 14, 21.

That which formally makes this [charity] a Christian grace is the spring from which it flows. Snodgrass.

formate (fôr-mat), n. [fôr-mat + -ate.] A salt formed by the union of formic acid with a base. Also called formate.

formation (fôr-ma'shon), n. [fôr-mat, Sw. formation, < F. formation = Sp. formacion = Pg. formação = It. formazione, < L. formatio (-n-), < formare, form; see form, v.] 1. The act or process of forming or making; the operation of composing by the union of materials or elements, or of shaping and giving form; as, putting or coming into form; as, the formation of a state or constitution; the formation of ideas or of character.

The sixth day concludes with the Formation of Man. Addison, Spectator, No. 359.

2. Disposition of parts or elements; formal structure or arrangement; conformation; configuration: as, the peculiar formation of the heart; a formation of troops in columns, squares, etc.

The doomed men marched on, without any formation.
E. Sackville, in the Soudan, p. 63.

The well disciplined picket had gone right about-face like a single person. They maintained this formation all the while we were in sight.
R. L. Stevenson, Island Voyage, p. 148.

3. That which is formed; anything considered as to its form, structure, or arrangement: as, the formation consisted of a mass of incongruous materials. Specifically—4. In geol., properly, a group or assemblage of rocks, whether stratified or unstratified, having a similar origin or some common physical character. Some geologists use the word formation as the equivalent of system, or as designating a group of strata having the same geological age. See system.

Thus we speak of stratified and unstratified, fresh-water and marine, aqueous and volcanic, ancient and modern, metalliferous and non-metalliferous formations.
Sir C. Lyell, Manual of Geology, p. 3.

Formerly it was considered sufficient to collect the more typical specimens of a species, and to be satisfied with a general collection to represent the formation. "In this is added in a note: 'The term formation is in some respects objectionable, but it is convenient, and no satisfactory substitute has as yet been proposed.'"
Prestwich, Geology, p. 6.

Alluvial formations. See alluvial. Free-cell formation. See free. Polar formation. In nath, the application of the operation x^2 , x^3 , x^4 , etc.

formational (fôr'mâ-shon-ål), a. [< formation + -al.] Pertaining to formation or formations.

Formational and historical geology.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXII, 214.

formative (fôr'mâ-tiv), a. and n. [< F. formativus = Pr. formativus = Sp. Pg. H. formativus, < NL. formativus, < L. formare, pp. formatus, form: see form, v.] I. a. 1. Giving form or shape; having the power of giving form; plastic; shaping; molding; determining: as, the formative yolk of an egg, which changes into an embryo; a formative process.

The meaneft plant cannot be raised without seeds by any formative power residing in the soil.
Bentley, Sermons.

Cumberland substitutes a throughout for the idea of right as formative in ethics that of natural good.
Bibliotheca Sacra, XLIII, 512.

2. Pertaining to formation or development; related to the fixation of or growth into form or order: as, the formative period of youth or of a nation; formative experiments.

The man who has learned it (history) as he learns French or German from a travelling conversation book does not gain either the formative effect on the judgment, or the great inheritance of scientific study.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 73.

To them who did not consider the formative nature of the book . . . it seemed as if the young author (Swainburne) was lusting after strange gods.
Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 300.

3. In gram., serving to form; determining grammatical form or character as a part of speech or derivative; inflectional: as, a formative termination.

II. n. In gram., a formative element of a word; that which serves to give grammatical form; an addition to or modification of a root or crude form, giving it special character.

formator (fôr'mâ-tor), n. [< L. formator, a former, shaper, < formare, form, shape: see form, v. Cf. former 2.] Same as conformator.

formature (fôr'mâ-tur), n. [= Ug. formatura; *< L. as if formatura, < formare, form: see form, v.] The act of shaping or forming. [Rare.]

These infant communities were easily susceptible of formature by leading men.
The Chauvinist, (11), 480.

form-board (fôr'm'bôrd), n. An inferior kind of pasteboard used for packing, bookbinding, etc. It is made from waste paper, refuse rags, and coarser portions of the pulp.

forme¹, a. [ME. < AS. forma, first: see former 1.] Former; first.

Adam our forme father.
Chaucer, Tale of Melibon.

forme² (fôr'm), n. A Middle English spelling of form, still retained in English and Scotch usage among printers. See form, n., 6.

formé (fôr'mâ'), a. [F., pp. of former, form: see form, v.] In her., same as patte.

formed (fôr'med), a. 1. Arranged, as stars into a constellation.—2. In her., seated or crouched as in its form: said of a hare.—3. Trained; developed; mature: as, a formed character.—Formed bachelor. See bachelor, 2.

formedon (fôr'mê-don), n. [L. forma doni.] In old Eng. law, a writ of right for the recovery of lands by one claiming according to the form of a gift or grant thereof.—Formedon in the descender, such a writ brought by the heir in tail against an alienor of a preceding tenant in tail.—Formedon in the reverter, such a writ brought by the one entitled to the reversion.

formel, n. [ME. formel, formele, formaylle, appar. an altered form, in simulation of ME. femel, female, female, of OF. forme, a female of the falcon or hawk kind.] The female of the falcon family of birds.

Nature held on his hand
A formel eagle
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 373.

form-element (fôr'm'el-ment), n. Anything that enters into the structure or composition of something else, giving it a recognizable form or constitution. Thus the corpuscles of the blood are form-elements of that fluid; a cell is a form-element of any tissue; an ultimate fibril of muscle is a form-element of flesh.

formen (fôr'mên), n. [< form-ic + -en.] Methane, or marsh-gas.

former¹ (fôr'mér), a. and n. [Mod. E., with compar. suffix -er, < ME. forme, first, < AS. forma, first (= OS. forma = OFries. forma), < for, fore, fore, before, + -ma, superl. suffix. See for, fore, and cf. foremost.] I. a. 1. Being before in place; fore; first; foremost.

He was ever in the former front, and hidde Calbourne in his right honde, and smote on the right side and on the left.
M. T. (E. T. 8), iii, 531.

Coming from Sardis, on our former enighn
Two mighty eagles fell, and there they perched Shak., J. C., v. 1.

2. Being or happening before in time; preceding another or something else in order of time; prior.

He shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth.
Hos. vi, 3.

'Tis but the funeral of the former year.
Pope, To Mrs. M. B.

At what former period, under what former administration, did public officers of the United States thus interfere in elections?
D. Webster, Speech, Oct. 12, 1832.

3. Past; especially, long past; ancient.

Enquire, I pray thee, of the former age.
Job viii, 8.

After Ages can know nothing of former times but what is recorded by writing.

4. Preceding or going before in a series; antecedent in order of thought, of action, etc.; specifically applied to the antecedent one of two things, or of two parts or divisions of anything.

Then speak again, not all thy former tale,
But this one word.
Shak., K. John, iii, 1.

My two former [letters] were of Judaism and Christianity.
Howell, Letters, ii, 10.

A bad author deserves better usage than a bad critic; a man may be the former merely through the misfortune of want of judgment; but he cannot be the latter without both that and an ill temper.
Pope.

Former adjudication. See adjudication.—Syn. 2. Prior, anterior, antecedent. See previous. 3. Bygone.

II. n. A predecessor. Darius.

former² (fôr'mér), n. [*< ME. former, formour, formour, formyour, < OF. former, formour, formeur, < L. formator, a former, < formare, form: see form, v. Cf. formator.] 1. One who forms, fashions, creates, or makes; a creator.

We belevon God, formour of he venge and of erthe.
Manderell, Travels, p. 2.
Fader and formour of al that were was makod.
Piers Plowman (B), ix, 27.

2. Specifically, a pattern in or upon which anything is shaped, as a piece of wood used for shaping cartridges and gun-wads; any mechanism contributing to give shape to an article in process of manufacture.

To roll up the cases for rockets you must have a smooth round ruler, or, as it is called, a former, exactly the size of the cavity of the rocket, and 10 or 12 times as long.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 124.

The cutting pressure of the tool tends to hold the former and the plate together.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LIV, 250.

formeret (fôr'mê-ret), n. [< OF. formeret, formeret, < forme, form: see form, v.] In arch., the arched rib which in ribbed vaulting lies next the wall and in a plane parallel to it. It fixes the form of the vault longitudinally, and is less than the other main ribs which divide and support the vaulting. See ribbed vault, arc, groin, under arch.

formerly (fôr'mê-ri), adv. 1. First; first of all; beforehand.

But Calidore, that was more quicke of sight, Prevented him before his stroke could light,
And on the helmet smote him formerly.
Spenser, F. Q., vi, l. 38.

If I had not formerly read the Barons Wars in England, I had more admired that of the League in France.
Howell, Letters, iv, 11.

2. In time past; at a certain point or through an indefinite period in the past; of old; heretofore.

Marry, 'tis a withered pear; it was formerly better.
Shak., All's Well, i, 1.

At this time the King forgot not a deliverance he had formerly had.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 404.

3. In time just past; just now; as aforesaid.

Thou hast incur'd
The danger formerly by me rehear'd.
Shak., M. of V., iv, 1.

=Syn. 2. Once, anciently; Formerly, Previously. Formerly means before the present time, and perhaps a considerable time before; previously, before some particular event or time, and generally up to that point: as, the rates of postage were formerly much higher than now; they were reduced in 1846, having previously been at an average of about 12 cents.

formest, a. superl. A Middle English form of foremost.

formful (fôr'm'fûl), a. [< form + -ful.] Ready to form; creative; imaginative. [Rare.]

As fleets the vision o'er the formful brain,
This moment hurrying wild the impassion'd soul,
The next in nothing lost.
Thomson, Summer, l. 1022.

form-genus (fôr'm'jê-nus), n. In biol., a genus composed of similar form-species.

When vigorously growing and dividing, the Schizomycetes as a rule present certain definite forms, which are at any rate so constant under constant conditions that they can be figured and described with such accuracy and certainty that good observers have regarded them as fixed species, or at least as form-species or forma genera.
Eucy. Brit., XXI, 401.

formiate (fôr'mi-ât), n. Same as formate.

formic (fôr'mik), a. [= F. formique; short for formique, q. v.] Pertaining to, produced by, derived from, or characteristic of ants. Also formicæ.

When we are told to go to the ant and the bee, and consider their ways, it is not that we should borrow from them formic laws or apian policy.
Southey, The Doctor, xvi.

Formic acid, HCOOH, an acid obtained from a fluid emitted by ants when irritated. This fluid contains both malic and formic acids, and by infusing ants in boiling water an acid as strong as vinegar is obtained, which has been used in place of vinegar. Formic acid exists also in certain other insects in the common stinging nettle, and in various animal liquids. It is prepared commercially by heating oxalic acid and glycerin, the oxalic acid separating into carbon dioxide and formic acid. It is a colorless fluid of strongly acid smell, and produces a blister and great pain when dropped on the skin. Formic ethers, ethers obtained by the substitution of alcoholic radicals for the replaceable hydrogen of formic acid: thus, ethyl formic ether, (C₂H₅)COH.

Formica (fôr'mi-kâ), n. [L. (> It. formica = Sp. hormiga = Ug. formiga = Pr. formiga = F. fourmi), an ant, emmet.] 1. The typical genus of ants of the family Formicidae, formerly, as used by Linnaeus, coextensive with the whole group of formicarians, but now greatly restricted. It still contains many species, having the abdominal pedicel one-jointed, the mandibles triangular and denticulate, and the female stinging. F. rufa is a common red ant, found both in Europe and in North America.

2. [L. c.] [ML., a kind of abscess (apostema), lit. an ant; also called porrum, lit. leek; cf. F. ougeon, a bunion, lit. an onion.] An abscess; in falconry, a distemper in a hawk's bill which eats it away.

formican (fôr'mi-kan), a. [< L. formica, an ant, + -an.] Of or pertaining to the ant; resembling an ant.

The driver ants . . . are vagabonds and wanderers upon the face of the earth, formican tramps.

Eschsch. Mag., XII, 480.

formicant (fôr'mi-kant), a. [< L. formican(t)-e, pp. of formicare, crawl like ants, feel (as the skin) as if crawled over by ants. < formica, an ant.] Crawling like an ant; applied in medicine to the pulse when it is extremely small, scarcely perceptible, unequal, and communicates a sensation like that of the motion of an ant perceived through a thin texture. Dunghson.

formicaria, n. Plural of formicarius.
Formicariæ (fôr'mi-kâ-ri-ê), n. pl. [*NL., fem. pl. of ML. formicarius, adj.: see formicarius.] A superfamily name of the ants, conterminous with the family Formicidae in a large sense; synonymous with Heterogyna.

formicarian (fôr'mi-kâ-ri-an), a. and n. [*< ML. formicarius (> OF. formicarius), pertaining to ants. < L. formica, an ant: see Formica.] I. a. 1. In entom., of or pertaining to ants: formicæ.—2. In ornith., of or pertaining to ant-birds; formicarioid.

II. n. 1. In entom., one of the Formicariæ; an ant.—2. In ornith., an ant-bird; a formicarioid passerine bird.

Formicariidæ (fôr'mi-kâ-ri-i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Formicarius + -idæ.] A family of formicafield passerine birds, having long slender feet, the outer toe united at the base to the middle toe, full plumage on the rump, and a characteristic coloration; the South American ant-birds. The family is divisible into Thamnopodidae (ant-shrikes), Formicariidae (ant-wrens), and Formicariidae (ant-thrushes). Under various names, the Formicariidae have been included with several different groups of birds with which they have little affinity, as the Laniidae, Turdidae, etc.; and the terms Formicariidae and Formicariidae have usually included a number of heterogeneous forms now eliminated. The family as here limited is confined to the warmer parts of America, and is highly characteristic of the Neotropical fauna. Also Formicariidae.

Formicariinae (fôr-mi-kä-ri-i-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Formicarius + -inae.] A subfamily of Formicariidae, the ant-thrushes proper, resembling in form but not in coloration the old-world pittas (with which they were formerly confounded). They have a thrush-like bill, large stout feet, a very short square tail, sexes usually alike in color, and terrestrial habits. These ant birds are confined to the warmer parts of America; the genera and species are numerous. Also formicarioid.

Formicarioid (fôr-mi-kä-ri-oid), a. and n. I. a. Having the characters of the Formicariidae, as an ant-shrike, ant-wren, or ant-thrush proper. Also formicarioid.

II. n. One of the Formicariidae; a formicarioid or tracheophonous passerine bird.

Formicarioides (fôr-mi-kä-ri-oid-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Formicarius + -oides.] A superfamily of birds, the ant-thrushes or formicarioid passerines, a group of non-oscine Passeres, with tracheal syrinx and schizopodous feet; the Tracheophona of authors. It is a large series of some 500 species, confined to the Neotropical region. Leading families are the Formicariidae, Furnariidae, Dendrocapitidae, Pteropodidae, etc.

formicarium (fôr-mi-kä-ri-um), n.; pl. formicaria (-ia). [ML.] Same as formicary.

Formicarius (fôr-mi-kä-ri-us), n. [NL., < formicarius*, pertaining to ants, < formica, an ant: see Formica.] The typical genus of ant-thrushes of the family Formicariidae and subfamily Formicariinae, containing such as F. montiger and many others.

formicarioid (fôr-mi-kä-ri-oid), a. Same as formicarioid.

Formicariidae a group of passerine birds embracing ten families not normally acrotyoid, as the tingulid, from turrid, tanagrid, and sturnoid passerines respectively. A. R. Wallace, Ibis (1871), p. 406.

formicary (fôr-mi-kä-ri), n.; pl. formicaries (-ries). [ML. formicarium, an ant-hill (prop. neut. of formicarius*, adj.). < L. formica, ant: see formicarian, Formica.] An ant's nest or ant-hill; the nest or burrow inhabited by a colony of ants. See ant-hill.

In a formicary we can detect no trace of private property; the territory, the buildings, the stores, the booty, exist equally for the benefit of all.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XII, 196

This work they [the ants] carry on until enough workers are reared to attend to the active duties of the formicary. Science, III, 54 formicate (fôr-mi-kät), a. [(< L. formica, an ant, + -ate.)] Of, pertaining to, or resembling an ant or ants. Also formicene.

formication (fôr-mi-kä-shon), n. [= F. formication, < L. formicatus, < formicare, crawl like ants, feel (as the skin) as if crawled over by ants: see formicant.] In pathol., an abnormal subjective sensation, referred to the skin, resembling the feeling of ants creeping over the body.

formicid (fôr-mi-ik), a. [(< L. formica, an ant, + -icid.)] Same as formicid.

formicid (fôr-mi-sid), n. and a. I. n. An ant of the family Formicidae.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Formicidae. Also formicidae.

While the superiority of the ants as a group to the remaining Hymenoptera, to all other insects, and to the rest of the annelose "sub-kingdom," is undisputed, we are unable to decide which species of ant is elevated above the rest of the Formicidae family. Pop. Sci. Mo., XII, 197.

Formicidae (fôr-mis-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Formica + -idae.] A family of aculeate hymenopterous insects, of the series Heterogyna or Formicariae; the ants. It is specially characterized by the form of the abdomen, the first joint of which (and in one subfamily the second also) forms a lenticular scale or knot of variable shape, serving as a peduncle to the rest. All the species are social, and live in colonies, consisting of males, females, and neuters. See ant, and cut under Atta.

formicide (fôr-mi-sid), a. See formicid.

Formicina (fôr-mi-si-nä), n. [NL., < Formica + -inae.] A genus of ants, of the family Formicidae. F. rufa, known as the horse-ant, is an example.

formicine (fôr-mi-sin), a. [(< L. formicus, < formica, an ant: see Formica.] Same as formicene.

Every trading vessel in the tropics has its formicaria fauna, and cannot help acting as a transporter of all sorts of ants. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 31

Formicivora (fôr-mi-siv-o-rä), n. [NL., < L. formica, an ant, + vorare, eat, devour.] The type-cal genus of ant-wrens of the subfamily Formicivorinae, containing such as F. ferruginea and others.

Formicivorinae (fôr-mi-siv-o-ri-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Formicivora + -inae.] A subfamily of the family Formicariidae; the ant-wrens. It comprises small weak species with comparatively slender and pointed bills, black the sexes unlike in color, the males being varied with black and white, and the females with brown.

formidability (fôr-mi-da-bil-i-ti), n. [(< formidabile: see ability.)] The quality of being formidable; formidableness. [Rare.]

A Mackintosh has been taken who produces their formidability by being sent to lose two claws. Walpole, To Maun, II, 98 (1743) formidable (fôr-mi-da-bl), a. [(< F. formidabile = Sp. formidable = Pg. formidável = It. formidabile, < L. formidabilis, causing fear, < formidare, fear, dread; cf. formido (formidin), n., fear, dread.)] Exciting or fitted to excite fear or apprehension; hard to deal with; difficult to overcome, perform, or the like: applied to persons or things possessing such strength, power, or capability, or presenting such obstacles to action or progress, as to discourage effort or inspire dread of failure.

I swell my preface into a volume, and make it formidable, when you see so many pages behind. Dryden, End of Euclid

One or two of the present ministers are pleased to represent me as a formidable man. Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, II

The master of such a force [sixty thousand troops] could not but be regarded by all his neighbors as a formidable enemy and a valuable ally. Macaulay, Prichard the Great formidableness (fôr-mi-da-bl-nēs), n. The quality of being formidable, or adapted to excite dread.

formidably (fôr-mi-da-bl-ly), adv. In a formidable manner.

formidolose (fôr-mi-dō-lōs), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. formidoloso, < L. formidolosus, formidulosus, full of fear, < formido, fear, dread: see formidabile.] Dreading greatly; very much afraid. Bailey.

forming-cylinder (fôr-ming-sil'in-dēr), n. See cylinder.

forming-machine (fôr-ming-mā-shēn'), n. 1. A machine used for bending tin-plate, and in making hollow ware.—2. An apparatus for shaping articles made from fabrics of various kinds, as hats from plaited straw.—3. A machine for twisting strands of fiber into rope.

formless (fôr-m'les), a. [= D. formloos = G. formlos = Dan. Sw. formlös: as form + -less.] Wanting form or shape; without a determinate form; shapeless; amorphous.

What's past, and what's to come, is strewn with husks And formless ruin of oblivion. Shak., T. and C., I, 3. A formlessly (fôr-m'les-ly), adv. In a formless manner.

His long coat hung formlessly from his shoulders. Howells, Anna Kilburn, vi.

formlessness (fôr-m'les-nēs), n. The state of being without form.

Formosan (fôr-mō'sān), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to Formosa, a large island lying southeast of China, to which country it belongs.—Formosan deer. See deer.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Formosa. formosity (fôr-mōs'i-ti), n. [(< OF. formosité = It. formosità, < L. formosus (t-), beauty, < formosus, beautiful: see formous.] Beauty; gracefulness.

The thunder-thumping Jove transfused his dotes into your excellent formosities. Sir P. Sidney, Wentworth Play, p. 619.

formous, a. [= Pg. It. formoso, < L. formosus, beautiful, < forma, form, beauty: see form, n.] Beautiful; fair. Halliwell.

O pulchritude sole in beaute full incident, Of all feminine most formous flour. The Nurse, Lovers Worthie, I, 23.

form-species (fôr-m'spē'shēz), n. In biol., a species constituted by a single stage in the course of development of a species which undergoes transformations, and in many cases originally supposed to be the only form of the species.

formula (fôr-mū-lä), n.; pl. formulas, formulas (-le, -lāz). [= G. Dan. Sw. formel = F. formule = Sp. Pg. formula = It. formula, formula, < L. formula, a small pattern or mold, a form, rule, principle, method, formula, dim. of forma, a form: see form, n.] 1. In general, a prescribed form or rule; a fixed or conventional method in which anything is to be done, arranged, or said; particularly, a form of words in which something is required by rule or custom to be stated.

Formulas are but decent and apt passages or conveyances of speech, which may serve indifferently for differing subjects. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II, 255.

The memory disburdens itself of its cumbersome catalogues of particulars, and carries centuries of observation in a single formula. Emerson, Misc., p. 51.

Specifically—2. Eccles., a written confession of faith; a formal enunciation or statement of doctrines. See creed, and confession of faith, under confession, 3.—3. In math., any general equation; a rule or principle expressed in algebraic symbols.—4. In chem., an expression by means of symbols and figures of the constituents of a compound. See chemical formula, under chemical.—5. Abel's, Cauchy's, Frullani's, Kummer's, Poisson's formulas, in math., certain formulas relating to definite integrals. Approximate, associative, characteristic, chemical, dental, diminution, distributive, duplication, empirical, etc. formulas. See the qualifying words. Cotes's, Gauss's, Simpson's formulas, formulas for approximate quadratures. Euler's formula, the formula expressing the sine and cosine of an angle as the sum of two exponentials.—Formula of Christison, a rule for estimating the amount of solids in urine, namely: Multiply the last two figures of the specific gravity of the urine expressed in four figures by 2.33 to obtain the total solids in grains in 100 cubic centimeters. Also called Hare's formula. Formula of coincidence. See coincidence. Formula of Concord. See concord.—Fourier's formula, the equation where $x \leq 4\pi$.—Graphic, myological, etc., formula. See the adjectives. Incidence, coincidence formulas, formulas of geometry for determining the numbers of incidences and coincidences of different kinds under given conditions.—Lambert's formula, a formula for obtaining the mean wind direction from a table of observed directions viz.

$$\tan \phi = \frac{E - W + (NE + SE - SW - NW) \cos 45^\circ}{N - S + (NE + SE - SW - NW) \cos 45^\circ}$$

where ϕ is the angle between the north and the mean wind direction measured round by east. Plucker's formula, equation showing the number of singularities of plane curves.—Stirling's formula, the approximate expression*

Of the nature of a formula or formal statement; stated precisely, or according to certain forms; also, explicitly prescribed; ritual.

Why, Sir, in the formulary and statutory part of law a plodding blockhead may excel. Johnson, quoted in Boswell, I. 13.

2. Closely adhering to formulas or rules; formal. [Rare.]

There is . . . in the incorruptible Sea green himself, though other wise so lean and formulary a heart felt knowledge of this latter fact. Carlyle, French Rev., III. 111.

II. n.; pl. formularies (riz). 1. A prescribed form or model; a formula.

The formularies for exorcism still continued, as they continue to the present day, in Roman Catholic rituals, and they were frequently employed all through the eighteenth century. Locke, Rationalism, I. 118.

2. A collection or system of set forms; especially, a book containing prescribed forms used in the services of a church; as, the formulary of the Church of England is the Book of Common Prayer.

formulate (fôr'mu-lat), v. t.; pret. and pp. formulated, ppr. formulating. [< formula + -ate.] To reduce to or express in a formula; state in a precise and comprehensive or systematic form.

Along with social development, the formulation in law of the rights pre-established by custom becomes more definite and elaborate. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 102.

There is nothing so pitilessly and unconsciously cruel as sincerely formulated into dogma.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 1-5.

Some talkers excel in the precision with which they formulate their thoughts, so that you get from them some what to remember, other talkers effuse as they go. Emerson, Chab.

formulation (fôr'mu-lâ'shon), n. [= F. formularia = Sp. Pg. It. formulario; as formulate + -ion.] The act, process, or result of formulating.

Only fifty years separate Galileo's "Discorsi" from Newton's "Principia," and the formulation by Leibnitz, in the same year 1686, of the doctrine of the conservation of energy. Pop. Sci. M., XIII. 356.

formulatory (fôr'mu-lâ-to-ri), a. [< formula + -ory.] Pertaining to formulation; formulated.

He presents the unfamiliar in the guise of the familiar. Put in this bald formulatory fashion, the difference between the two may seem unimportant. Westminster Rev., CXXXVIII. 341.

formule (fôr'mul), n. [< F. formule, < La. formula; see formula.] A formula.

See def. 1 (a).—Fornix cranii, the arch or arched roof of the cranium; the skull-cap or calvarium.—Fornix of Gottsche, in teeth. See the extract.

There is a peculiarity about the structure of the optic lobes, which has given rise to much diversity of interpretation of the parts of the brain in osseous fishes. The posterior wall of these lobes, where it passes into the optic bulb, or in the region which nearly answers to the valve of Venus in mammals, is thrown forward into a deep fold which lies above the crura cerebri and divides the latter a tertio ad quartum ventriculum from the ventricles of the optic lobes throughout almost the whole extent of the latter. This is the fornix of Gottsche. Huxley, Anat. Part, p. 142.

Fornix of the conjunctiva, the line of reflection of the conjunctiva from the eyelids to the eyeball.

Systems of fortification, special methods of arranging and constructing the works in and around a fortified place, so that the different parts shall be co-operative. These methods have been designated by engineers, according to the plan of the enceinte, as (a) the circular or circullinear system, (b) the polygonal or caponiere system, (c) the tenailed system, and (d) the bastioned system. To these in modern times may be added the armored or turreted system. Wahner, Syn. Fortification, Bunker, Castle, Citadel, Fort, Fortress, Munition, Ramp, et. Reduction, etc. Fortification is the only one of these words that is used for the art or science, or for all classes of defensive works, the others represent kinds of fortifications. Thus, fortress represents a large, and fort generally, but not always, a smaller stronghold, defensible on all sides, pleasure and convenience of our lives?

Goldsmit, Vicar, xxi.

forty (fôr'ti), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also fourty; < ME. forti, fourty, fourth, fourti, fourer, etc., < AS. fourtig (= OS. fiuortig, flortig, flortig = O'Fris. fiuortich = D. veertig = OHG. forzig, MHG. vierzig, G. vierzig = Icel. fiortíu, fortug = Sw. fyrtio, fyrtio = Dan. fyrti, forti = Goth. fidur tigis = L. quadraginta (> It. quaranta = Sp. cuarenta = P. quarenta) = Gr. τεσσακοντα = Skt. chaturvīṇṣatī], forty, < for, four, etc., + -tig, E. -ty, etc., of the same ult. origin as ten: see four and -ty, and cf. twenty, thirty, etc.] I. a. Four times ten; ten more than thirty, or one more than thirty-nine: a cardinal numeral.

II. n.; pl. forties (-tiz). 1. The sum of four tens, or of thirty-nine and one.—2. A symbol representing this number, as 40, XL, or xl.—The Forty. (a.) A body of magistrates in ancient Athens for the trial of small cases in the rural demes. (b.) The name (with qualifying terms) of two appellate civil tribunals and a criminal court in the Venetian republic. (c.) A collective designation of the members of the French Academy, forty in number. Also called the Forty Immortals.—The roaring forties, the notably rough part of the North Atlantic crossed on the passage from Europe to the ports of North America between the 40th and 50th degrees of north latitude. The term is also applied to the region between 40° and 50° south latitude in the South Atlantic, Pacific, and Indian oceans.

forty-five (fôr'ti-fiv'), n. A game of cards, played with a full pack, in which each trick counts five and the game is forty-five. Five cards (two and three or three and two) are dealt to each player, and the top card after dealing is turned up as the trump. The ace of hearts is always a trump, ranking next below the knave of the trump suit, which is itself second in rank, the five spot being highest. The other cards have their normal value, except that in the black suits the lowest spot card takes the trick when no face-card is played. Suit must be followed when a trump is led, but in other cases a player may trump if he chooses. A player taking all five tricks in one hand wins the game.

forty-knot (fôr'ti-not), n. The Alternanthera Aohyrantha, a prostrate amarantaceous weed of warm countries. It is said to have diuretic properties.

fortyneter, n. An obsolete form of fortune.

forty-niner (fôr'ti-nî-er), n. One of the adventurers, chiefly from the United States, who went to California in search of fortune soon after the discovery of gold there in 1848. The greater number of them arrived in 1849; hence the name. [Colloq., U. S.]

forula (fôr'u-lî), n.; pl. forula (-le). [ML.: see forrel.] A case of leather or similar material in which old manuscripts have been preserved.

The remarkable forula, or case of thick stamped leather, in which the "Book of Armagh," an Irish MS., supposed to be of the early part of the 10th century, has been preserved.
Archæol. Inst. Jour., XIII, 178.

forum (fôr'm), n.; pl. forums or fora (-rumz, -rî). [< L. forum, a market-place, forum, akin to foris, foras, out of doors, foras, pl. fores, a door: see foreign and door.] 1. In Rom. antiq., the market-place of a city. It was the official center of the public and corporate life of the city, and assembly for the people. The word was originally applied to an open space or area left before any edifice, and particularly before a tomb. In ancient Rome the space left vacant at the first agglomeration of the city for the transaction of judicial and other public business was specifically called the Forum, or Forum Romanum. Two other judicial forums were constructed by Julius Cæsar and Augustus, and all three were richly adorned with columns, statues, etc., divided by the rostra into a comitium or court and a place of public assembly, and surrounded by temples, porticos in which financial business was transacted, and other buildings. There were many forums exclusively for market purposes. Compare agora.

In you held below,
A thousand years of aliened factions sleep—
The Forum, where the immortal accents glow,
And still the eloquent air breathes—burns with Cicero!
Byron, Child's Harold, iv, 112.

Hence—2. A tribunal; a court; any assembly empowered to hear and decide causes.

He [Lord Camden] was, however, fully more eminent in the senate than the forum.
Brougham, Earl Camden.

Law of the forum, the rules of law prevailing within the jurisdiction of a particular court, as distinguished from the law in other jurisdictions.

forwaker, v. t. [ME. forwaken* (in pp.); < for-1 + wake.] To exhaust with waking; tire out with long watching.

He was forweped, he was forwaked.
Gower, Conf. Amant., II, 15.

Wery, forwaked in her orisons, Sleepeth Custance.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, I, 496.

forwalk, v. t. [ME. forwalken; < for-1 + walk.] To weary with walking.

Whanne thei theder comen
Al wery for walked, & wolde take here reste.
William of Palerne (C. E. T. S.), I, 2735.

forwarder, v. [ME. forwandrien; < for-1 + wander.] I. intrans. To wander till wearied.

Thanne dismayed, I left alle sool [soul, alone]
Forwery, forwarded as a fool.
Rom. of the Rose, I, 3335.

Thy far asple
A weary wight forwarder by the way
Spenser, F. Q., I, vi, 34.

II. trans. To weary with wandering; cause to wander until weary.

I was very forwarded, and went me to reste.
Piers Plowman (B), Proh., l. 7.

His armes, which he had vowed to dispossesse,
She gathered up, and did about him dresse,
And his forwarded steed unto him gott.
Spenser, F. Q., III, vi, 20.

forward¹ (fôr'wârd), a. [< ME. forward, rarely forward (in adv. forwardes), < AS. foreward, rarely forward, forward, fore, early, in front, < for, fore, before, + ward: see for-1 and ward. Cf. forward², adv., and forward³, n.] 1. Situated in the front or fore part; anterior; fore; directed toward some point or position in advance from the starting-point: as, a forward cabin in a ship; the forward movement of an army.

Four legs and two voices. . . . He forward since now Is to speak well of his friend; his back-ward voice is to utter foul speeches and to detract. Shak. Tempest, II, 2.

2. Being in a condition of advancement; well advanced with respect to progress, attainment, development (as the season), growth (as vegetation), or (rarely) position or rank: as, the building is in a forward state; he is forward in his studies; a forward crop.

My good Camillo,
She is as forward of her breeding as She is of the rear of our birth. Shak. W. T., iv, 3.

[He] was well pleased to hear that our catalogue of English Manuscripts was so forward in the Press at Oxford.
Liter. Journey to Paris, p. 119.

Come tell me in plain Terms how forward he is with Araulita.
Congreve, Old Batchelor, III, 6.

The Athenians, deserted by the other states, met his invading army, in which the exiled chief of that faction, Hippias, had a forward appointment.
Hærodotus.

3. Ready in action or disposition; prompt; earnest; also, in a derogatory sense, overconfident; assuming; presumptuous; pert: as, to be forward in good works; a forward chit.

God grants in us the true knowledge of his works, with a forward will to follow it.
Ascham, The Schoolmaster, p. 56.

Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell specially Shak. Chronicle, p. 287.

It were unbecomely
That we be found less forward for our prince
Than they are for their lady.
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, II, 5.

You need not call me to any House of yours, for I am forward enough to come without calling.
Hoodell, Letters, I, v, 17.

Your cousin Sophy is a forward, impudent gipsy.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, III, 1.

Clara is of a cold temper, and would think this step of mine highly forward.
Sarriana, The Duenna, I, 5.

44. Foremost.

First and forward she began to weep.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, I, 944.
—Syn. 3. Willing, zealous; presuming, presumptuous, impudent.

forward¹, forwards (fôr'wârd, -wârlz), adv. [< ME. forwarde, forwardes, < AS. foreward, adv., forward (= D. voorwaarts = G. vorwärts), < for, fore, before: see forward¹, a.] 1. Toward a part, place, or point of time before or in advance; onward: with reference either to motion or to position: opposed to backward.

And fro this forwardes never entred such the filthe in that Place amonges hem, no nevere schalle entere here afire.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 61.

A great coyle there was to set him forward.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I, 103.

From this time forward I will be your Master.
L. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 68.

If a man will walk straight forward without turning to the right or the left, he must walk in a desert, and not in Cheapside.
Macaulay, Conversation between Cowley and Milton.

2. With advancing steps; with good progress.

It is the nature of God's most bountiful disposition to build forward where his foundation is once laid.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v, App. 1.

3. Toward the terminal point.

It [Sequoia Reichenbachii] has indeed stiff, pointed leaves, lying forward, but they are arcuate, and the cones are smaller.
Dawson, Geol. Hist. of Plants, p. 128.

Drawn forward. See draw.—To bring forward, go forward, set forward, etc. See the verbs.—To put one's best foot forward. See foot.—Syn. Forward, Onward. Forward is toward what is or is imagined to be the front or the goal; onward is in the direction of advance.
Generally they come to the same thing, but onward indicates a less definite aim: the traveler lost in the woods feels it to be necessary to go onward, when he finds his way, he presses forward.

The mustering squadron, and the clattering car,
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed.
Byron, Child's Harold, III, 25.

There is no death with Thee: each plant and tree
In living haste their stems push onward still.
Jones Very, Poems, p. 53.

forward¹ (fôr'wârd), v. t. [< forward¹, a. and adv.] 1. To send forward; send toward the place of destination; transmit: as, to forward a letter or despatches.

All the dragées [sugar plums] were forwarded by the ambassador's bag.
Mrs. Gore, Mothers and Daughters, p. 259.

2. To advance; help onward; promote; further; encourage: as, to forward the growth of a plant.

The occasional propensity to this superstition [symbolic figures] was, without question, forwarded and encouraged by the priesthood. Warburton, Divine Legation, iv, § 4.

3. In bookbinding, to fit (a book) with back and covers, and prepare it for the finisher.—Syn. 1.
To expedite, accelerate, despatch—2. To further, promote, foster, favor.

forward², n. [ME. forward, forward, forward, forward, < AS. foreward, forward, also fore-ward, agreement, contract (= D. voorwaarde, conditions, precontract). < for, before, + ward, ward, keeping: see for-1 and ward, n.] Agreement; covenant.

To break forward is not myn entente.
Chaucer, Proh. to Man of Law's Tale, I, 60.

This forward to fulfill faithfully that swore,
Upon solemnest sacrifice, soche as that vœt.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I, 11447.

forwarder (fôr'wârd-er), n. 1. One who forwards or sends forward; specifically, in the United States, one who ships or sends forward goods for others to their destination by the instrumentality of third persons; a forwarding merchant. Neither a consignor shipping goods nor a carrier while engaged in transporting them is called a for-warder. The name is applied, strictly, to one who undertakes to see the goods of another put in the way of transportation, without himself incurring the liability of a carrier to deliver. A carrier who undertakes to transport the goods only part of the way often becomes a forwarder in respect to the duty of delivering them to some proper carrier to complete the transportation.

2. One who forwards, promotes, advances, or furthers.

Nor am I accessory,
Part or party confederate, . . . forwarder,
Principal or maintainer of this late theft.
L. Barry, Ram Alley, v, 1.

3. In bookbinding, a workman who, after receiving the sewed book, puts on its back and covers, trims its edges, and fits it for the finisher.

The ends of the cords are then drawn by the forwarder through holes pierced in the boards. Cr. Dict., I, 424.

forwarding (fôr'wârd-ing), n. [Verbal n. of forward¹, c.] 1. The act or business of sending forward merchandise, etc.; the business of a forwarder. See forwarder, 1. [U. S.]—2. The Forum of Pompeii.

A, principal entrance; B, C, Corinthian temple; D, the public prison [see prison]; E, the temple of Venus, the patron goddess of the city; F, the temple of Mars, the patron god of the city. The forum was a large open space, with a large temple on the left and several smaller buildings on the right. The forum was the center of the city's public life, and it was here that the people gathered for the markets and the public games.

was usually surrounded by the chief public buildings, and often ornamented with statues and other works of art. Justice was administered in the forum or in buildings opening upon it, and it was a normal place of as-fossa¹ (fō'sā, n., pl. fossae (ā. [1, a ditch or trench: see *foss*²] 1. In anat., a fossa, pit, depression, or hollow of some kind in the structure, specified by a qualifying term.—2. In zool., a deep pit or depression in the integument of an animal, often opening into the interior cavity of the body and serving for Fossa rhomboidalis, the fourth ventricle of the brain. Fossa sigmoidalis, the groove on the internal surface of the mastoid portion of the temporal bone lodging the lateral sinus. Fossa triangularis, the fossa of the antihelix of the ear. See second cut under ear. — Glenoid fossa, one of two shallow fossae: (a) The surface by which the scapula articulates with the humerus. (b) The surface by which the temporal bone articulates with the lower jaw. Improperly extended in human anatomy to include the whole of the smooth surface of the vaginal process behind the Glacian fissure, in relation with the parotid gland, and not concerned in the temporomaxillary articulation. See cut under skull. — Orbital fossa, that part of the base of the skull lying between the posterior border of the horizontal plate of the palata bone and the anterior border of the foramen magnum. Iliac fossa, the general inner surface of the iliac bone, occupied by the iliacus muscle. See cut under cinematograph. Incisive fossa, a little depression on the surface of the upper jaw bone just above the sockets of the incisor teeth. Inframaxillary fossa, the surface of the dorsum of the scapula below the spine, occupied by the inframaxillary muscle. See cut under scapula. Isthioforectal fossa, a deep pit in the perineum, on each side of the lower end of the rectum, between that and the tuberosity of the ischium, of triangular pyramidal form, its base directed to the integument of the parts, its apex corresponding to the divergence of the ischioanal and from the obturator muscle. It is bounded internally by the sphincter and levator ani and occygeus muscles, and externally by the ischium and obturator muscle, behind by the edge of the glutens maximus and great sacrotuberile ligament, and is filled with a mass of adipose connective tissue, the frequent site of abscesses. — Jugular fossa, a pit on the temporal bone, entering into the formation of the posterior incisive foramen of the skull, in special relation with the beginning of the jugular vein, at the confluence of the lateral and inferior petrosal sinuses. Lacrimal fossa, a small depression in the orbital part of the frontal bone, lodging the lacrimal gland. — Myrtiform fossa. Same as incisive fossa. Nasal fossae, the two cavities which constitute the internal part of the nose. They are the seat of smell, and they aid also in respiration and phonation. See cut under nose. — Occipital fossae, two pairs, upper and lower, of depressions on the inner surface of the occipital bone, the upper lodging the occipital lobes of the cerebrum, the lower lodging the cerebellum, the latter being the same as the posterior vertical or cerebellar fossae. The two pairs are separated horizontally at the plane of the tentorium by the ridges and groove for the lateral sinus, the right and left fossae being separated vertically by the line of the falx cerebri and falx cerebelli; at the junction of the four fossae is the internal occipital protuberance. — Olecranon fossa, a deep pit at the back of the lower end of the humerus, receiving the olecranon when the forearm is extended. Palatine fossae. Same as palatine foramina (which see, under foramen). Pituitary fossa, a pit on the top of the body of the sphenoid bone, receiving the pituitary body. Called in human anatomy the sella turcica or Turkish saddle, and bounded by four prominent ethmoid processes. It is the most important landmark of the skull, indicating the site of the transverse fissure of the cerebrum, the forward third of the notochord, and thus the boundary between the vertebral and the cranial divisions of the cranium, in the early embryo it is a perforation. See cut under skull. Pterygoid fossa, the depressed interval between the diverging internal and external pterygoid processes of the sphenoid bone, filled in by the internal pterygoid muscle. See cut under skull. Scaphoid fossa. (a) A slight apical depression of the general pterygoid fossa, whence arises the tensor palati muscle. (b) The tuberculate fossa of the outer ear, the groove between the helix and the antihelix; the fossa of the helix. See second cut under ear. — Sigmoid fossa, a curved groove on the inner surface of the mastoid bone for the lateral venous sinus. Sphenomaxillary fossa, a small triangular recess on the outer surface of the cranium, below the apex of the orbit, where the sphenoid, sphenomaxillary, and pterygomaxillary fissures converge, bounded by parts of the sphenoid, sphenomaxillary and palata bones, lodging the sphenopalatine or Meckelian ganglion, communicating with the cranial, nasal, zygomatic, and cerebral cavities, and having opening into it the foramen rotundum, the vidian, pterygopalatine, sphenopalatine, posterior palatine, and other foramina. — Submaxillary fossa, a pit on the inner surface of the lower jaw-bone, where runs the submaxillary gland — Subcapular fossa, the concave anterior surface of the scapula occupied by the subcapular muscle. — Supraspinous fossa, the surface of the dorsum of the scapula above the spinous process, occupied by the supraspinatus muscle. — See cut under scapula. — Temporal fossa, the general depression on the outer surface of the side of the skull, in the temporal region, above the level of the zygoma, filled in by the temporal muscle, and continuous below the zygoma with the zygomatic fossa. — Trochanteric fossa, same as digital fossa. See digital. — Zygomatic fossa, the general recess on the side of the skull below and within the zygomatic arch, being the downward extension of the temporal fossa, from which it is distinguished by a ridge on the great wing of the sphenoid bone separating the temporal from the external pterygoid muscle. It is bounded by the surrounding surfaces of the sphenoid, superior maxillary, malar, and inferior maxillary bones.

Fossa (fos'sä), n. [NL., < fossa, a native name.] 1. In zool., a genus of Madagascan viverrine quadrupeds, allied to the genet. F. daubentonii is the lambanling or fossa, a grayish black animal, whitish below, striped and spotted above, and with the tail half ringed. 2. [l. c.] The species of this genus, formerly called tanetta fossa.

fossage (fos'sä), n. [< fossa + -age.] In old law, a duty levied on the inhabitants of a fortified town for the purpose of cleaning the foss surrounding it; or a composition paid to be free from the duty of cleaning the foss.

fossak (fos'ak), n. An estuarine form of the common European trout, Salmo fario.

The tidal trout, or so-called fossak of the Inver and other rivers. Athenaeum, April 11, 1888, p. 503.

Fossar (fos'sär), n. [NL. (Adanson); etymology unknown.] The typical genus of Fossaridae. J. E. Gray, 1840.

Fossarian (fo-sä'ri-an), n. [< M.L. Fossarii, pl., < L. fossa, a ditch; see foss2.] 1. In eccl. hist., about the fourth century, one of a body of minor clergy who were employed as grave-diggers, and more commonly known as Capatari. — 2. One of a body of sectaries, about the fifteenth century, who rejected the sacraments, and celebrated their peculiar rites in ditches and caves.

fossarid (fos'sä-rid), n. A gastropod of the family Fossaridae.

Fossaridae (fo-sä'ri-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Fossar + -idae.] A family of gastropods, taking name from the genus Fossar. The head is probosciform, the radula provided with seven rows of teeth, of which the central is cuspidate, the lateral transverse, and the marginal elongate and simple. The shell is turbinate, spirally costate or grooved, with an entire aperture and an almost straight columella. The operculum is corneous and subapical or subconcentric. The species are sparingly distributed in most warm seas.

fossel (fos'et), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of fauces.

fossel-seller (fos'et-säl'er), n. One who sells fauces.

You wear out a good wholesome forenoon in hearing a fossel-seller between an orange-wife and a fossel-seller. Shaks., Cor., II, 1.

fosselle (fo-sot'), n. [F., dim. of fosse, a ditch; see foss2.] 1. A little hollow; a dimple. — 2. In pathol., a small ulcer of the transparent cornea, the center of which is deep.

fosseway, n. See fossway.

fossick (fos'ik), v. i. [Of obscure dial. origin.] 1. To be troublesome. [Prov. Eng.] — 2. In gold-digging, to undermine another's digging; search for waste gold in relinquished workings, washing-places, etc.; hence, to search for any object by which to make gain; as, to fossick for clients. [Australia.]

The latest linguistic importation comes from Australia in the shape of the verb "to fossick". Daily Telegraph (London).

I discoursed with the eldest boy, Allick, . . . who kept the whole family in bread, besides supplying his mother with quare, by what is called fossicking in the creek for waste gold. H. Kinsley.

fossick (fos'ik), n. [See fossick, v.] A troublesome person. Halicell. [Prov. Eng.] fossicker (fos'ik-ör), n. A miner who tries his luck in abandoned mines, or works over old waste-heaps, in the hope of finding something of value. [Australia.]

A fossicker is to the miner as the gleaner to the reaper, he picks the crevices and pockets of the rocks. R. Brown Smith.

fossil (fos'sil), a. and n. [Formerly also fossile; < F. fossile = Sp. fósil = Pg. fósil = It. fossile, < L. fossilis, dug out, dug up, < fodere, pp. fossus, dug.] I. a. 1. Dug out of the earth; as, fossil coal; fossil salt.

151 from the depth of many a yawning mine Thy fossil treasures rise. Dodgley, Agriculture, III.

2. Pertaining to or resembling fossils; preserved by natural inhumation, as an organic body, in form and sometimes in texture; as, fossil shells, bones, or wood. See II., 2.

Language is fossil poetry. Emerson, The Poet.

Fossil remains of Men or implements of human manufacture have hitherto been found only in late Tertiary deposits, and in caves, mingled with the remains of animals which lived during the glacial epoch.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 422. Spiders are not creatures which belong solely to the present geologic era of the earth, for fossil spiders . . . as well as spiders in amber have been found; the oldest in the coal formation. Engce. Brit., II, 220.

3. Figuratively, antiquated; superannuated; outgrown; belonging to a past epoch or discarded system; as, a fossil statesman; fossil manners or literature. — Fossil beaver, button-mold, copal, etc. See the nouns. — Fossil charcoal, same as mother-of-pearl (which see, under coal). — Fossil cork, foss paper, and wood, popular names for asbestos respectively of cork-like, flax-like, or paper-like texture, or resembling fossilized wood. — Fossil farina. See farina. — Fossil flour, infusorial earth, as that often found beneath peat-beds: a white impalpable, flour-like powder, consisting for the most part of the silicious shells of diatoms. — Fossil ivory, ivory furnished by the tusks of mammoths preserved from prehistoric times in the ice of northern Siberia. It is of good quality, and sufficient in quantity to be an important article of trade. — Fossil screw, a popular name for a cast in rock left by a spiral shell. R. D.

II. n. 1. Any rock or mineral, or any mineral substance, whether of an organic or of an inorganic nature, dug out of the ground. — 2. Specifically, in later geological and mineralogical use, anything which has been buried beneath the surface of the earth by natural causes or geological agencies, and which bears in its form or chemical composition the evidence that it is of organic origin.

Thus, the shell of a mollusk may be preserved unchanged, in both form and chemical composition, or, while retaining its original form, it may have been converted into silica; or it may have disappeared entirely, leaving only a cast as evidence of its former existence, or there may remain only a mold of its interior, formed after the soft parts had entirely decayed. In any of these cases, the specimen or fragment of rock which thus shows by its form that it, either wholly or in part, belonged to an organic body, or that its configuration resulted from the presence of something having had an organized existence, would be properly called a fossil. Even the rocks showing traces of trails, footprints, bored cavities, or other evidences of contact with organic life, are usually designated as fossils. The bones or other remains of species now living on the earth, if buried by any recent catastrophe, such as a flood or land slide, would not, as a general rule, be designated as fossils, but would be called recent. If, however, such an entombment took place in prehistoric times, the term fossil would be by most geologists be used in describing the occurrence in preference to recent.

3. Hence, figuratively, one who or something which is antiquated, or has fallen behind the progress of ideas; a person or thing of superannuated or discarded character or quality; as, a curious literary fossil. — Dyestone fossil. Same as dyestone ore. See dyestone.

fossilized (fos'sild), a. [< fossil + -ized.] Fossil; fossilized.

fossiliferous (fos-i-lif'ë-rus), a. [= F. fossilifer, < L. fossilis, fossil, + ferre = F. bear.] Bearing or containing fossils; as, fossiliferous rocks.

Neither Hutton nor his friends had any conception of the existence of the great series of fossiliferous formations which has since been unfolded by the labors of later observers. Deiker, Geol. Sketches, II, 23.

fossilification (fo-sil'i-fik-ä'shon), n. [< fossilify; see fossilize.] The act of fossilizing or of becoming fossil; petrification.

fossilify (fo-sil'i-fi), v.; pret. and pp. fossilified, pp. fossilifying. [< fossil + -ify.] I. trans. To convert into a fossil; fossilize; petrify.

II. intrans. To become a fossil; petrify.

fossilisation, fossiline. See fossilization, fossilize.

fossilism (fos'il-izm), n. [< fossil + -ism.] 1. The state of being fossil; the character of a fossil, in any sense of that word. Also fossility. — 2. The scientific study of fossils; paleontology. Also called fossilology, fossilology.

fossilist (fos'il-ist), n. [< fossil + -ist.] One who studies fossils; one versed in the scientific study of fossils; a paleontologist.

It is well shewed by tall ash trees of a species, as Mr. Jones, the fossilist, informed me, uncommonly valuable. Johnson, Jour. to Western Isles.

fossilite (fo-sil'i-ti), n. [= F. fossilite; as fossil + -ity.] Same as fossilism, 1.

fossilization (fos'il-i-zä'shon), n. [= F. fossilization; as fossilize + -ation.] The act or process of fossilizing, or converting animal or vegetable substances into fossils or petrifications; the state of being fossilized. Also spelled fossilisation.

A large proportion of aquatic creatures have structures that do not admit of fossilization. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 242.

fossilize (fos'il-iz), v.; pret. and pp. fossilized, pp. fossilizing. [= F. fossilize; < fossil + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To reduce to a fossil condition; convert into a fossil; as, to fossilize bones or wood. — 2. To render like a fossil; cause to become antiquated or out of harmony with present time and circumstances and the progress of ideas; as, age has a tendency to fossilize men's minds and ideas.

There, indeed, you are among the French, the fossilized remains of the old regime. Bulwer, Pelham, xlii.

II. intrans. 1. To become or be changed into a fossil. — 2. To become antiquated or obsolete; become out of harmony with the present time and circumstances by falling behind the progress of ideas.

Also spelled fossilise.

fossilologist (fo-sil'ë-jist), n. Same as fossilologist. Jodrell.

fossilogy (fo-sil'ë-ji), n. Same as fossilism, 2. fossilologist (fos-i-lol'ë-jist), n. [< fossilology + -ist.] One versed in fossilology; a fossilist.

fossilology (fos-i-lol'ë-ji), n. [< fossil + -ology; see -ology.] Same as fossilism, 2.

fossor (fos'ör), n.; pl. fossores (fo-sö'rëz). [L., < fodere, pp. fossus, dig; see foss2.] A grave-digger.

The fossores, or grave-diggers, who appear to have established a kind of property in the Catacombs. Encyc. Brit., V, 214.

Fossores (fo-sö'rëz), n. pl. [L., pl. of fossor, a digger; see fossor.] 1. In entom.: (a) In Latreille's system of classification, the second family of aculeate hymenopterous insects. It was divided into Scutellera, Sappiptes, Sphagites, Bembexes, Larrates, Synmura, and Crabronites, and was nearly equivalent to the modern Fossoria, not including the family Mutillidae. (b) The digger-wasps; the Fossoria.

It is a group of burrowing hymenopterous insects having the posterior abdominal segments not retractile and the basal joint of the hind tarsi not dilated. The females are armed with a sting, and the neuters, when there are any, are winged. The group includes such families as the Vepridae, Sphagidae, Pompilidae, etc., together with the Mutillidae. (c) A Latreillean group of fossorial caraboid beetles, the Bipartiti or Scari-tides. — 2. In mammal., a group of burrowing or fossorial quadrupeds.

Fossoria (fo-sö'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL.; see Fossores.] A division of hymenopterous insects, including the burrowers, as burrowing-wasps, sand-wasps, mud-wasps, daubers, etc.; practically the same as Fossoria, 1 (b).

fossorial (fo-sö'ri-äl), a. and n. [< L.L. fossorius, < L. fossor, a digger; see fossor.] I. a. 1. Digging, burrowing, or excavating, especially in the ground; fodient; as, a fossorial animal.

— 2. Fit or used for digging or burrowing; as, a fossorial limb. — 3. Able to dig or burrow; being a burrower; specifically, of or pertaining to the Fossores, Fossoria, or Fodientia; as, fossorial nature or habits; a fossorial insect or quadruped. — Fossorial Hymenoptera, Hymenoptera belonging to Latreille's group of the Fossoria. They generally have all the tibiae strongly spined, but not expanded as in the typical fossorial limb. — Fossorial legs, in entom., legs in which the tibiae are very broad, flat, or concave beneath, and generally with several processes or teeth on the outer edge, serving like claws for digging. The tarsus also may be expanded, but generally it is small and sometimes entirely absent; the whole leg is stout and has great muscular force. The fossorial form is most commonly seen in the anterior legs; it is well exemplified in the mole-cricket and in many Coleoptera.

II. n. An animal which digs into the earth for a retreat or residence, and whose feet are adapted for that purpose; a burrowing animal.

fossorious (fo-sö'ri-us), a. [< L.L. fossorius; see fossorial.] In entom., same as fossorial.

fossula (fos'ül-ä), n.; pl. fossulae (-lë). [L., dim. of fossa, a ditch; see foss2.] A small fossa; specifically, a vacant space representing one of the primitive septa of certain corals, as the Rugosa, more fully called a septal fossula. Also fossule.

The septal fossula usually presents itself as a more or less conspicuous depression or groove in the chalice. . . . In general it is a simple space or deficiency caused by the absence or abortion of one of the four primary septa. Encyc. Brit., VI, 322.

fossulate (fos'ül-jät), a. [< fossula + -ate.] In anat. and zool., grooved; slightly excavated or hollowed out; having a small or shallow fossa.

fossule (fos'ül), n. [< fossula.] Same as fossula.

fossulet (fos'ül-let), n. [< fossule + -et.] In entom., a somewhat long and narrow depression; a fossula: said of the sculpture of insects.

Mature in years, to ready honours move;
O of celestial seed; O, patron of Jove!
Druid. Alcibiades

fostress (fos'tres), n. [(*sister*¹, v., + -ess.] A woman who nourishes or rears; a nurse.
Come forth; your fostress bids; who from your birth Hath bred you to this hour.

fother¹ (foth'ər), n. [Also written jodder, dial. judder; < ME. fother, futhur, rarely fuder, < AS. futhur, futhur, a load (of wood, fagots, gravel, etc.), a wagon-load, cart-load, = OS. fūthar = D. voeder, voer, a wagon-load, cart load, voeder, a wine-cask, = Ld. fuder, for = OHG. fudhar, MHG. vuoder, G. fuder, a wagon-load, a certain measure for wine. The F. fouder, a tun, Sw. foder, a tun, fora, a wagon-load, are of Ld. origin.] 1t. A wagon-load; a cart-load.

With him ther was a ploughman, was his brother,
That hadde had of dong ful many a fother.
Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 830.

2†. A load ; weight ; burden ; mass.

Many man weeneth to grieve other,
And on his head falleth the gother.
Richard Cœur de Lion, l. 1781.

Heere neither Hippo is a foul further, king Alexander, l. 6467.

3. An old unit of weight for lead, lime, and some other substances; a two-horse cart-load. A tother of lead varies from 194 to 224 hundredweight, each hundredweight being a really 120 pounds avoirdupois. At Newcastle in England a tother is a third of a chaldron; and in American lead-mines the word is sometimes used for a short ton.

fother² (foth'ers, v. t. [Prob. < Icel. fódhra, line or fur (a garment), = Dan. foder, furs = Sw. fodra, line or fur (cf. Dan. foring, lining, naut. ceiling, foot-waling), = G. füttern, line, ensue, < Icel. fódhr = Dan. Sw. foder, a lining, ensue, Dan. foor, lining, = *AS. foder, fódder (rare), a canoe (boga-fódder, a quiver), = OHG. fuotar, MHG. enoter, G. futter, a sheath, a case, = Goth. fōdr, a sheath: see further under forel and *far*¹.] To place a sail or tarpaulin over, as a leak in a ship's hull, for the purpose of keeping the water out. In fothering a leak, rope yarns, oakum, etc., are thickly attached on the sail or tarpaulin.

If you can't stop a leak by fatherring, you can ease the measure of water upon the hole.

fotiver (fò'tiv), a: [C l. fotus, pp. of fovere, warm; see foment.] Nourishing.

If I not cherish them
With my distilling dew, and solare heat,
They know no vegetation.

Carew, Colonn Britannicum, iv.

foetal (foetal), n. [Origin not ascertained.]
A commercial term for 70 pounds of lead. It was legalized by a statute of Edward I.
fon (fō), a. [See, also written four and fu, =
E. ful?, u.] Full of food or drink; drunk.

They had been foul for weeks together.
Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

fou (fó), n. [A particular use of few, a., full.]
A bushel. [Scotch.]

For my last son,
A hearty (heart) (ill) of corn, I'll reserve one

Burns, Auld Farmer's Salutation to his Auld Mare.

fouaget, n. An obsolete variant of fouage.
fouat (fō'at), n. See fouet.

Foucault currents (fō-kōl' kur'ents). Currents of electricity which are induced in a mass of metal when in motion relatively to a non-uniform magnetic field, or when stationed in a magnetic field of varying intensity. When the intensity of the magnetic field surrounding a mass of metal or other conductor is by any means increased or diminished, Eddy currents are generated in the conductor. A uniform motion of translation in a uniform magnetic field does not produce such currents. Eddy currents in the conductor to a uniform magnetic field do not produce them. Eddy currents are produced in heating the mass of metal by the magnetic field which they are due.

foucht, n. [A contr. of fouche.] In hunting, a quarter of a buck foucht, v. t. [fouch, n.] To divide (a buck) into quarters.

foudrét, n. See foulder.
foudroyant (the great ant), a. [F., pp. of fou- clanger, strike with lightning, (foudre, lightning; see foulter.) 1. Sudden and overwhelming in effect; like a lightning-stroke. [Rare.]

U. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, II. xxi

2. Specifically, in pathol., beginning in a very sudden and severe form: said of disease.

fouet (fō'et), n. [See, also written fouat, fouets, fouon, fouee, fews; origin obscure.] The house-leek.

The king's leaving Scotland has taken all custom from Edinburgh; and there is hay made at the Cross, and a dainty crop of fouets in the Grassmarket.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, II.

fougade (fō-gād'), n. [F., < fougue, < It. foga, impetuosity, passion, fury, prob. a var. of fuga, flight, < L. fuga, flight; see fugue. Cf. fouganse.] Milit., a little mine in the form of a well, 8 or 10 feet wide and 10 or 12 deep, charged with sacks of powder, or powder and shells, and covered with stones or earth. Sometimes a fougade is dug outside the works of a fortification or post as a defense, and sometimes beneath to destroy them by explosion.

fouganse (fō-gans'), n. [F., < fougue; see fougade.] Same as fougade.

fought (fō), interj. [Var. of faugh, foh.] Bah! an exclamation expressing disgust or contempt.

Fought! he smells all lamp-oil with studying by candle-light.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, III. 2.

fought (fōt). Preterit and past participle of fight. foughten (fō'tn), p. a. [Another form of fought, pp. of fight; for the second meaning, cf. for-foughten.] 1. That has been fought. [Archaic.]

And not a foughten Field,

Where Kingdoms' rights have lain upon the spear and shield,

But Plains have been the place.

Drayton, Polyolbion, III. 137.

Hence—2 (fōt'n). Overworked; outworn; troubled. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

Are we not foughten and harassed

For gear to gang that gate at last?

Burns, The Two Dogs.

foul (foul), a. and n. [< ME. foul, ful, < AS. fūl = D. cuil = OHG. fūl, MFG. ful, G. faul, foul, rotten, lazy, idle, etc., = Icel. full = Sw. Dan. ful = Goth. fuls, foul; with deriv. suffix -l, from a verb repr. by Icel. pp. fuunn, rotten, Teut. √ fu* = Indo-Eur. √ pu*, in L. pus (Gr. πῦρ), pus, putres, stink, putres, be rotten, (Gr. πῦρ, make rotten (> ult. E. putrid), Lith. puti, rot, Skt. √ pū, stink; see putrid, pus, etc. Hence fith, falsom (in part), foulmart, etc.]

I. a. 1. Grossly offensive to the senses; of a filthy or noxious character or quality; noisome; disgusting; as, foul matter or excretions; a foul smell; foul breath.—2. Of a harmful or mischievous character; causing trouble or annoyance; obnoxious; obstructive; clogging; as, foul weeds; foul weather; a foul wind.

In the morning [ye say], It will be foul weather to day: for the sky is red and lowering Mat. xvi. 3.

What a brave day again!

And what fair weather, after so foul a storm!

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, I. 3.

Till our arrival here we have had only one day's foul wind.

The Century, XXXVII. 24.

3. Affected by noisome or debilitating matter; in a filthy state or condition; unclean; dirty; turbid; defiled; as, foul clothing; a foul den; a foul stream.

My face is foul with weeping, and on my eyelids is the shadow of death.

Joh. xvi. 10.

The way was long and wondrous foul.

Dutchess of Suffolk's Calamity (Child's Ballad, VII. 302).

Throw foul linen upon him, as if it were going to buck-lag.

Shak., M. W. of W., III. 3.

Let Austria clear thy way with hands

Foul from Ancona's cruel sack

Whitney, To Plus IV.

4. Affected by harmful matter or things; obstructed by anything fixed or attached; clogged; choked; as, a foul garden (one full of weeds); a foul chimney (one choked with soot); the ship's bottom is foul (clogged with seaweeds or barnacles); the channel has a foul bottom (one cumbered by rocks, wrecks, or the like).

He acquainted his lordship that his ship had grown foul to a degree that must necessarily hinder her fast sailing.

Franklin, Autobiog., p. 27.

The voyage to Suez is very dangerous, more especially south of Tor, where there is much foul ground.

Pococke, Description of the East, I. 135.

5. Clogged or impeded as by collision or entanglement; in a state of obstructing contact or involvement; with of before the obstructive object; as, the ship is foul of a rock or of another ship; a rope or an anchor is foul from being jammed, entangled, or clogged in any way.

The wind blew so high, they durst not send out a Boat, though they much doubted she would be foul of their Rocks.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 161.

6. Contrary to or violating rule or established usage; done, acting, or acted upon improperly; irregular; disorderly; unfair; as, a foul blow or stroke; a foul player or fighter; a foul attack. See foul play, below.—7. Grossly offensive or loathsome in a moral sense; manifesting, or prompted or actuated by, base or vicious feeling; vile; odious; shameful; revolting; as, foul thoughts or actions; foul language; a foul slander, murder, conspiracy, etc.; a foul slanderer or conspirator.

Foul whisperings are abroad: unnatural deeds

Do breed unnatural troubles. Shak., Macbeth, v. 1.

Foul deeds will rise,

Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.

Shak., Hamlet, I. 2.

This was extremely foul, to vex a child thus.

Fletcher, Pilgrim, III. 3.

Nature's crost

Was mother of the foul solitudes

That saturate soul with body

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

8. Extremely bad as to effect or result; unfavorable; unlucky; pernicious; distressing; as, a foul accident; a foul prospect or omen. [Not now in common use.]

Some foul mischance

Torment me for my love's forgetfulness.

Shak., E. G. of V., II. 2.

If I cannot recover your niece, I am a foul way out.

Shak., T. N., II. 3.

A foul trouble there was to make him kneel to receive his Crown.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 106.

Endbold, vexed with an evil spirit, fell off into foul fits of distraction.

The supply-chamber of a fountain-pen or of a fountain-inkstand, or the reservoir for oil in certain kinds of lamps, etc.—8. Hero's fountain, a pneumatic apparatus in which the elastic force of a confined body of air, increased by hydraulic pressure and reacting upon the surface of water in a closed reservoir, produces a jet which may rise above that surface to a height equal to the effective height of the pressing column: named from Hero of Alexandria, to whom the invention of the instrument is ascribed. It consists essentially of an open basin, and two closed reservoirs at different levels below the basin. A tube connects the upper parts of both the reservoirs. Another tube connects the bottom of the basin with the lower part of the lower reservoir. A detachable tube with a jet-nozzle at its upper end passes through the center of the basin and down into and very nearly to the bottom of the higher reservoir. The detachable tube being removed, the higher reservoir is partly filled with water through the opening; then the tube is replaced, and water poured into the basin. This water, running down into the lower reservoir, forces the air from the latter up into and increases the pressure in the higher reservoir, displacing the water therein and forcing it through the detachable tube in the form of a jet. This ejected water falls into the basin and thence passes to the lower reservoir, and thus the action continues till nearly all the water in the higher reservoir has been discharged through the jet.—9. the family Canidae and of the vulpine or alopecurid series of canines, especially of the restricted genus Vulpes, as V. vulpes of Europe. This animal is much smaller than the wolf with a pointed snout, erect ears, elongated pupils of the eyes long, slender, bushy tail tipped with white and mostly reddish brown or fulvous pelage. It is proverbially cunning, but lives in the ground, preys on lambs, poultry, and other small animals, and is the principal object of the chase in some countries, as Great Britain. It is more fully known as the red fox, and runs into several varieties, as the vesperine fox, silver or silver-gray fox, black fox, etc. The common

Red fox (Vulpes vulpes) of Europe fox of North America is very similar to the red fox of Europe being probably not specifically distinct. There are many other true foxes, or species of Vulpes proper. In different parts of the world one of the most notable of which is the Arctic fox or leucis. V. lagopus, which is of a dark color and turns white in winter. (See cut under fox for under arctic.) The corsak or arctic (V. corsak) of Tataria and India is one of a group of small foxes represented in North America by the kit or swift fox, V. velox. (See cut under corsak.) The gray fox of the United States is sufficiently different to have been placed in another genus, Cynomys (as V. cinereus-argenteus) to which the coast fox of California (V. latrans) also belongs. (The related and males of South America are those in the cut and are known as foxes of the general V. latrans group.) The foxes are small foxes of the genus Vulpes and are allied to Vulpes proper, but commonly placed in a different genus Penicillia (see cut under fox). The tail of the fox externally, but structurally different is the African V.

Maculosa (Otocorydon) a generalized form presenting a different subfamily Megastomina. The tail of the fox is called the brush. In the English Bible the word fox is used in some places to the jackal, in others to the fox. See

1. A common ornamental flowering plant of garden, Digitalis purpurea a native of Europe, where it is found in hilly and especially rocky subalpine localities. It has large tubular campanu-late flowers in long terminal racemes and is one of the most stately and beautiful of European plants. The flowers are purple or sometimes white or rose-colored.
The plant has valuable medicinal properties as a sedative and diuretic. See Digitalis.

For through the picture often times hath runne
To pluck the eye like a glove from their stems.

2. The name in Jamaica of species of Phytolacca—3. One of several plants of other genera. False foxglove of the United States, Gerardia flava and G. quinquefolia species allied to Digitalis, with large yellow flowers. Foxglove-pag, Pupillaria pul- chellata a small geometrid moth of England.—4. Wulfen foxglove, the Seymeria macrophylla, a species similar to false foxglove, a plant with yellow flowers, densely woolly within.

in which glass vessels which require annealing are exposed to heat in the tank.

fractid (frak'id), a. [L. fractus, soft, mellow, frangere, inceptive frangere, become soft or mellow, rot, spoil.] Rotten from being too ripe; overripe.

frack (frak), a. Same as frackl.

frackl (frak), v. [Perhaps < frackl = frackl.] trans. To abound, swarm, or throng. Hall. [Prov. Eng.]

trans. To fill to excess. Wright. [Prov. Eng.]

frack (frak), n. A hole in a garment. Hall. [Prov. Eng.]

fractable (frak'ta-bl), n. [L. fractus, pp. of frangere, break, + -able.] In arch., a gable-coping, when the coping follows the outline of the gable, and is broken into steps, crenelles, etc.

fracted (frak'ted), a. [L. fractus, pp. of frangere (frag), break, = E. break.] 1. Broken; violated.

His days and times are past
And my reliance on his fracted dates Hath smit my credit. Shak., T. of A. B. 1.
His heart is fracted, and corroborate.
Shak., Hen. V., II. 1.

2. Specifically, in her., broken asunder. This condition is depicted in different ways. Thus, a fractid may be represented as two semi-bars touching at one angle, or as a bar with a piece broken out of the middle and moved away. The latter must therefore give more than the name epithet fracted.

Chevron Fracted

Fracticornes (frak-ti-kôr'néz), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1802).] A group of coleopterous insects, representing a division of the family Curculionidae.

fraction (frak'shon), n. [ME. fraction, fraction, < OF. fraction = Pr. fractio = Sp. fractio = Pg. fracção = It. frazione, < L. fractio(a), a breaking, a breaking in pieces, ML. a fragment, portion, < frangere, pp. fractus, break, = E. break, q. v.] 1. The act of breaking, or the state of being broken, especially by violence; a breaking or fracture. [Rare.]

Such public judgment in matters of opinion must be seldom... for in matters speculative, as all determinations are fallible, so every act of them is to purpose, nor ever able to make compensation of either side, either for the public fraction, or the particular injustice.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 393.

2. Specifically (eccl.), the liturgical act of breaking or dividing the eucharistic bread, or host. For such fractions are found in different liturgies at different points in the office, but all do not occur in any one liturgy, namely: (1) A preparatory cutting or separation of portions at the beginning of the office or in the office of prayer; (2) a breaking at the word "break" (fragil) in the institution; (3) the solemn fraction after consecration and before communion; (4) a division for distribution among the communicants.

The bread, when it is consecrated and made sacramental, is the body of our Lord, and the fraction and distribution of it is the communion of that body, which died for us upon the cross.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 396.

The Fraction... in some liturgies precedes the Lord's Prayer.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 518.

3. A fragment; a separated portion; a discontinued part.

The fractions of her faith, out of her love,
The fractions a rays, the bits, and grains, & liquors
Of her over-eaten faith, are bound to liques.
Shak., T. and C., v. 2.

An elect fraction... did not turn their backs on the Messiah.

G. P. Fisher, Begin of Christianity, p. 38.

4. In math.: (a) In arith., a part, or a number of aliquot parts, of unity. Unity is regarded as divided into equal parts, and one or more of these parts are taken to constitute the fraction. The number of parts into which the unit is divided is termed the denominator, and the number of these parts taken the numerator. The denominator is commonly written in low, and the numerator above, a horizontal or diagonal line; thus, $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{3}{4}$. Fractions written in this form are called common or vulgar fractions. (See denominator.) A proper fraction is one whose numerator is less than its denominator; an improper fraction, one whose numerator is greater than its denominator; as, $\frac{3}{2}$. A mixed fraction expresses the ratio between two whole numbers; as $1\frac{1}{2}$, a compound or complex fraction expresses the ratio between fractions (or mixed numbers), or between a fraction (or mixed number) and a whole number; as,

$$\frac{\frac{1}{2}}{\frac{3}{4}} = \frac{2}{3} \times \frac{4}{1} = \frac{8}{3}$$

Compound or complex fractions can always be reduced to simple fractions. A compound fraction is also defined as a fraction of a fraction. A fraction is said to be reduced to its lowest terms when the numerator and denominator contain no common factor.

The fraction which denotes the ratio of the map to the true area is sometimes termed the representative fraction.

Hwyer, Physiography, p. 11

(b) In alg., a ratio of algebraic quantities analogous to the arithmetical vulgar fraction, and similarly expressed.—Astronomical or physical fraction, a fraction whose denominator is 60 or a power thereof: so called because angular degrees are so divided by astronomers, and lengths formerly were so also.—Continued fraction. See continued.—Convergent fraction. See convergent.—Decimal fraction. See decimal.—Rational fraction, a fraction whose numerator and denominator are rational; especially, one which can be resolved into a sum of two fractions of lower denominators.—Vanishing fraction, a fraction whose numerator and denominator are infinitesimal or vanishing together.—Vulgar fraction. See def. 4 (a).

fractional (frak'shon-al), a. [< fraction + -al.] Pertaining to fractions; comprising a part or the parts of a unit; constituting a fraction: as, fractional numbers.

So soon as the (colored) child is able to wield a hoe, he is regarded a fractional field hand, and during the cotton picking season quite a large fraction.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 42.

Fractional cultivation, currency, distillation, precipitation, etc. See the nouns.

fractionally (frak'shon-ally), adv. In a fractional manner; by a fraction.

The new discoveries in California and Australia rendered gold fractionally cheaper than silver.

Quarterly Rev., CXXVI. 458.

The chloride was next fractionally distilled, and a portion eventually obtained boiling constantly at 120°C.

Nature, XXIX. 30.

fractionary (frak'shon-ary), a. [= F. fractionnaire = Sp. Pg. fractionario, as fraction + -ary.] 1. Fractional.—2. Of a fractional nature; constituting a small part; hence, subordinate; unimportant.

Our sun... describing the sweep of such an orbit in space, and completing the mighty revolution in such a period of time as to reduce our planetary seasons and our planetary movements to a very humble and fractionary rank in the scale of a higher astronomy.

Chalmers.

Those who were contemporary to these great agencies (by which Christianity moved, saw only in part, the fractionary mode of their perceptions interpreted this common notion from them.

De Quincey, Essays, I.

Fractionary function. Same as meromorphic function (which see, under meromorphic).

fractionate (frak'shon-at), v. t.; pret. and pp. fractionated, pp. fractionating. [< fraction + -ate.] To subject to or obtain by the process of fractionation.

The liquid in the receiver was fractionated into portions.

Amer. Chem. Jour., VIII. 6.

These heavy oils were obtained by passing the gas over carefully fractionated pure light coal oil.

W. R. Bond, Coal Gas, p. 3.

fractionation (frak'shon-ay-shun), n. [< fractionate + -ation.] Chemical separation by successive operations, each removing from a liquid some proportion of one of the substances. The operation may be one of precipitation, or more familiarly of distillation.

The benzene... was obtained by fractionation from gasol.

Amer. Chem. Jour., VIII. 6.

fractionlet (frak'shon-let), n. [< fraction + -let.] A small fraction. [Rare.]

Wrote a fractionlet of verse entitled "The Beech."

Carlyle, In French, II. 16.

fractions (frak'shon), a. [Appar. an alteration (simulating fraction, fracture, etc.) of fractious (of fratched, restive, vicious, applied to horse). < fratch, reold, quarrel, squabble + -ous.] Apt to quarrel; cross; snappish; peevish; fretful; rebellious; as, a fractions child; a fractions temper.

The leading animals became fractions, and we were obliged to stop every few minutes, until their paroxysms subsided.

B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 141.

Men struggling doubtfully with fractions cows and frightened sheep.

L. Wallace, San Bur, p. 46.

fractionally (frak'shon-ally), adv. In a fractions manner.

fractionness (frak'shon-ness), n. The quality of being fractions; a fractions or snappish temper.

fractionosity (frak-ti-on-si-ti), n. [< L. fractus, broken (see fractid), + -osity, appar. after unfractumity.] The state of being fractured; superficial fracture.

This defect is remedied by replacing, which, relieves rates and reunites the various, correcting all fractionness and making the ware bright and new.

See Amer. S., LVIII. 17.

fractural (frak'thur-al), a. [< fracture + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a fracture.

Worcester, Supp. (1881).

fracture (frak'tjur), n. [< OF. fracture, F. fracture = Pr. fractura, fractura = Sp. Pg. fractura = It. frattura, < L. fractura, a break, fracture, cleft. < frangere, pp. fractus, break; see fraction.] 1. A breaking or a break; especially, a partial or total separation of parts of a consolidity, in arg., the breaking of a bone. The fracture of a bone is simple when the bone only is divided; compound when the breaking of the bone is accompanied by a laceration of the integuments; and comminuted or comminuted when the bone is broken in more than one place. Fractures are also termed transverse, longitudinal, or oblique, according to their direction in regard to the axis of the bone.

Likewise if any bones or limbs be broken, cerot mixed with the seed of rue and wax together is able to suture the fracture.

Holland, U. of Wey, ix. 13.

2. A broken surface, with reference to texture or configuration, or to manner of breaking; specifically, in mineral, the characteristic breakage of a substance, or appearance presented on a surface other than that of cleavage; as, a compure fracture; a fibrous fracture; foliated, striated, or conchoidal fracture, etc.

Fracture, taste, color, polarization, electrical properties, and transparency are among the least decisive popularities of minerals.

Amer. Geo., XI. 101.

3. Foreible separation or disunion; quarreling. [Rare.]

Let the sick man set his house in order before he die, reconcile the fractures of his family, reunite brethren, cause right understandings.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. 8.

Colles's fracture, fracture of the lower end of the radius of the forearm.—Greenstick fracture, a partial fracture of a young bone.—Pott's fracture, fracture of the lower end of the fibula with dislocation at the astragaloid articulation.—Syn. Fracture, Rupture, Break. Fracture of something hard, as a bone, glass, rock; rupture of something soft, as a blood vessel, the skin; break, a bad break of any kind, as, the cannon made a break in the wall. Fracture is rarely used figuratively, the others often are.

A bone may be broken at the part where it is struck, or it may break in consequence of a strain applied to it. In the former case the fracture is generally transverse, and in the latter more or less oblique in direction.

single species in the Andes of South America. Several are cultivated very extensively for the delicious fruit, which consists of a large fleshy receptacle bearing numerous small hard achenes upon its surface, and of which there are many varieties. F. indica which is the only species with yellow flowers has handsome but tasteless fruit and is cultivated for ornament. See strawberry.

fraggle (frag'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. fragged, pp. fragging. [Origin obscure.] To rob. [Local, U. S.]

fragile (frä'jil), a. [= F. fragile = Pr. fragilis, fragil = Sp. fragil = Pg. fragil = It. fragila, < L. fragilis, easily broken, brittle, frail, < frangere (frag), break, = see fraction.] Doublet, frail, q. v. Easily broken; brittle; hence, offering weak resistance to any destroying force; weak; easily destroyed; liable to fail.

The stalk of ivy is tough, and not fragile. Roemer.

Other incident thron
That nature's fragile vessel doth sustain
In life's uncertain voyage. Shak., T. of A., v. 2.

When subtle wits have spun their thread too fine,
'Tis weak and fragile, like Arachne's line.
Ric J. Denham, Progress of Learning.

Much ostentation vain of fleshly art
And fragile arms, much instrument of war, Long in preparing, soon to nothing brought.
Milton, P. R., III. 388.

Yet seem'd the pressure twice as sweet
As woodbine's fragile hold.
Tennyson, Talking Oak.

-Syn. Fragile, frail, weak, infirm, slight, delicate. Fragile is nearly always restricted to the physical; frail applies to the physical, but has also been extended to the moral.

On a sudden a low breath
Of tender air made tremble in the hedge
The fragile blindfold bells and briony rings.
Tennyson, The Brook.

How short is life! how frail is human trust.
Gay, Trivia, III. 235.

'The Kanawits have a custom of sending much of their deceased chief's goods afloat in a frail canoe on the river.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 112.

fragilely (frāj'il-lī), adv. In a fragile manner.
fragileness (frāj'il-nos), n. Fragility.
fragility (frāj'il-tī), n. [*< ME. fragilitate, fragilitas, < OE. fragilit, F. fragilité = Pr. fragilitat = Sp. fragilidad = Pg. fragilidade = It. fragilità, < L. fragilitas (-is), brittleness, < fragilis, brittle: see fragile. George Eliot, Middlemarch, xx.

fragmentary (frag'men-tā-ri), a. [< fragment + -ary.] 1. Composed of fragments or broken pieces; broken up; hence, not complete or entire; disconnected; disjointed.

What fragmentary rubbish this world is Thou know'st, and that it is not worth a thought Donne, Progress of the Soul, Second Anniversary.

It is only from little fragmentary portions of village churches that we learn that the round Gothic style was really at one time prevalent in the province.
Pearson, Hist. Arch., I. 623.

He murmured forth in fragmentary sentences his happiness. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, VI. 13.

There is no complete man, but only a collection of fragmentary men. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, VI.

2. Specifically, in geol., made up of fragments of other rocks: said of rocks such as tufas, agglomerates, conglomerates, and breccias.

fragmentation (frag'men-tā'shon), n. [< fragment + -ation.] A breaking up into parts or fragments; specifically, in geol., a breaking up into parts or joints which become new individuals, as in some Schizomyces: a form of fission.

It not unfrequently happens, however, that groups of cells break away from their former connexion as longer or shorter straight or curved filaments, or as solid masses.
In some filamentous forms this fragmentation into multi-cellular pieces of equal length or nearly so is a normal phenomenon, each partial filament repeating the growth, division, and fragmentation as before.
Engel, Brit., XXI. 402.

fragor (frā'gor), n. [*= Pg. fragor = It. fragore, < L. fragor, a breaking, a breaking to pieces, a crash, noise, < frangere (√ frag), break: see fraction.] A loud harsh sound; the report of something bursting; a crash. [Rare.]

Searc e sounds so far
The direful fragor, when some southern blast
Tears from the Alps a ridge of knotty oaks Deep fang'd, and ancient tenants of the rock.
Watts, Victory of the Poles.

fragor (frā'gor), n. [Irreg. < L. fragrare, emit a scent: see fragrant.] A strong sweet scent.

Gardens here for grandeur and fragor are such as no city in Asia outdoes.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 165.

fragrance (frā'grāns), n. [*= Sp. Pg. fragran-cia = It. fragranza, fragranzia, < ML. fragran-tia, < L. fragran(-s), fragrant: see fragrant.] The quality of being fragrant; that quality of bodies which affects the olfactory nerves with an agreeable sensation; sweetness of smell; pleasing scent; grateful odor.

as dates, figs, or raisins.

Great guns fourteen, three hundred pipes of wine,
Two hundred frailes of figs and raisins fine.
Mir. for Mage, p. 102.

As in Grape-Harvest, with vineyard pains,
A willing Troop of merry-singing Swains
With crooked hooks the sprouting Clusters cut,
In Frailes and Baskets them as quickly put.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Magnificence.

Three fraile of aprats, carried from mart to mart,
Are as much meat as those, to more use travel'd.
Flaucher (and another), Queen of Corinth, I.

[Here is] a frail of figs, which I send to yourself (in the barrel of raisins). Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 43.

2. A rush used for weaving baskets. — 3. A certain quantity of raisins, about 75 pounds, contained in a frail.

2. [A readoption of the Oriental form of the European name Frank, originating at the time of the crusades, when the Franks (that is, the French, and by extension the other nations of western Europe) became familiar to the Turks, Arabs, etc. See Feringee.] A European of the western nations: a common designation among the Turks, Arabs, and other Oriental peoples for any western foreigner.

Trust not for freedom to the Franks.
They have a king who buys and sells.

Byron, Don Juan, III. 86.

"Franks" quoth the Arab. . . "Franks are the fathers of hats, and do not wear gins or swords, or red caps upon their heads, as you do."

R. Curzon, Monast. in the Levant, p. 172.

frank² (frangk), a. [< ME. frank = D. G. Dan. Sw. frank, free, < OF. franc, frank, free, at liberty, exempt from subsidies, etc., liberal, valiant, etc., honest, etc., = F. franc = Pr. franc = Sp. Pg. It. franco, < ML. francus, free, at liberty, exempt from service, etc.; as a noun, a free man, a nobleman; prob., and according to the usual statement, a generalization of the tribal name Frank, OHG. Franko, ML. Francus, a Frank, pl. Franci, the Franks, the 'free' people, in distinction from the tribes in subjection to them: see Frank¹. Cf. slave², a serf, ult. < Slave¹, Slav, a Slavonian. Thus frank² has nothing to do, etymologically, with free or with free¹.] 1. Free; open; unrestrained; unconditioned. [Now rare.]

Thou hast it worse, for it is of frank's gift

Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 531.

At that time there is a faire, free and frank of al customs,
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 210.

Thy frank election make;
and they none to forsake, Shak., All's Well, II. 3.

In such frank style the people lived, hating three things with all their hearts: idleness, want, and cowardice.
Fraude, Sketches, p. 165.

2. Liberal; generous; not niggardly. [Rare.]
The frank and bountiful Charter granted by king Edward the first.
Hakluyt's Voyages, To the Reader.

Let them be ever so intelligent, and ever so frank of their advice.
Bacon, Moral Fables, v. Expl.
Being frank, she [Nature] lends to those who are free.
Shak., Sonnets, iv.

—Syn. 3. Open, ingenuous, etc. (see candid), plain, unreserved, undisguised.

frank² (frangk), v. t. [= OF. frankir, franquir (var. of franchir: see franchise, v.), free, = It. francare, free, exempt (and cf. franchise, v.); from the adj.: see frank², a.] 1. To send or cause to be sent by public conveyance free of expense: as, to frank a letter. The privilege of franking their own letters through the post, by indorsing their names on them, and also of giving franks to their friends, belonged to the members of the British Parliament from about 1600 till 1840, when it was abolished on the establishment of penny postage. The practically unlimited franking privilege formerly enjoyed by members of the United States Congress and many officers of government was abolished in 1873; but provision was afterward made for the free transmission of mail matter relating to official business, by the use of special envelopes, etc.

The representatives of the people. . . begin to make distinctions, by making exceptions of themselves in the laws. They may frank letters, they are exempt from arrests, etc.
J. Adams, the Government.

Hence—2. To facilitate the passage or movements of; give the right of way to, as a traveler. [Rare.]

*English itself, which will now frank the traveller through the most of North America, through the greater South Sea Islands, in India along much of the coast of Africa, and in the ports of China and Japan.

R. L. Stevenson, The Foreigner at Home.

frank² (frangk), n. [< Frank², v.] 1. The signature or indorsement of a person holding the privilege of franking mail-matter, written or impressed on the wrapper in token of the right of the inclosure to pass free.

Among some franks which were lately given to me were the undermentioned. I should feel much obliged if you could inform me. . . what in the succession was the writer, judging by the date of my frank.

N. and Q., 6th ser., XII. 10.

2. A letter thus indorsed, sent by mail free of postage.

frank³ (frangk), n. and a. [< ME. frank, an inclosure for fattening swine, poultry, etc., < OF. franc, a sty for swine, < franc, free, privileged, reserved: see frank².] 1. n. A pigsty; a pen for fattening boars.

P. Hen. Where sups he? Both the old boar feed in the old frank!

Burd. At the old place, my lord; in Eastcheap.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. 2.

II. a. Sty-fed. See I.

When they were once franked and fat, they stood up together proudly against the Lord and his words.
Bp. Hall, On Revelation, l. sig. I, III.

frank³ (frangk), v. t. [< ME. franken; < frank³, n.] 1. To shut up in a frank or sty: usually with up.

Marry, as for Clarence, he is well repaid;

He is frank'd up to fattening for his pains.

Shak., Rich. III., l. 3.

In the sty of this most bloody boar

My son George Stanley is frank'd up in hold.

Shak., Rich. III., iv. 5.

Middleton, Game at Chess, v. 3.

frank⁵ (frangk), n. [Said to be imitative.] A name of the heron, Ardea cinerea. [Local, Great Britain.]

frankalmoin, frankalmoine (frangk'al-moin), n. [< OF. franc almoigne, etc.: see frank² and almoine.] Free almon; in Eng. law, a tenure of land free from all temporal service; a tenure by which a religious corporation might hold lands to them and their successors for ever, on condition of praying for the soul of the donor. This is the tenure by which almost all the old monasteries and religious houses held their lands, and by which the parochial clergy and very many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary foundations hold them to this day, the nature of the service being in the Reformation altered and made conformable to the usage of the Church of England.

The lands of ecclesiastical corporations are to this day said to be held by the tenure of frank almoigne or free alms, though the explanation which originally supported the fiction of a tenure has disappeared since the Reformation.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 54.

The essence of the donation in Frankalmoine was that it was a gift to God in free and perpetual alms, and therefore it could never be held or enjoyed by any but a "religious corporation." In other words, no gift in Frankalmoine could be bestowed upon a parish or a layman.
N. and Q., 6th ser., XII. 519.

frank-bank (frangk'bank), n. Same as free-bench.

frank-chase (frangk'chase), n. In Eng. law, a right of liberty of free chase, whereby persons having lands within its limits are prohibited from cutting down any wood, etc., even in their own demesnes, to the prejudice of the right. Also called free-chase.

The forest is the most noble of all, for it is a franchise of so princely a tenure that, according to our laws, none but the King can have a forest; if he chance to pass one over to a subject, it is no more forest, but frank chase.
Houell, Letters, iv. 16.

Frankenia (frangk'kē-ni-ā), n. [After Johann Frankie (John Frankenius) (1590-1661), professor of medicine at Upsala.] A genus of low and heath-like perennial herbs or undershrubs, also constituting the natural order Frankeniaceae, and nearly allied to the Caryophyllaceae. There are about 30 species, widely distributed, but mostly found near the sea or in saline localities. The sea-beach F. linearis is common in Europe, and 3 species are found in western North America.

Frankeniaceae (frangk'kē-ni-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. A natural order of shrubs, represented by the genus Frankenia.

Milton, P. R., I, 371.

4. A deceiver; a cheat; a pretender; also, a fraudulent production; something intended to deceive. [Collog., U. S.] Actual fraud, or fraud in fact, a fraud in which there is an actual wrongful intent to deceive or take advantage of deception; a false representation of fact, made with a knowledge of its falsehood, or in reckless disregard of its truth or falsity, with the intent and effect of inducing another to act thereon. — Constructive fraud, legal fraud, an act or course of conduct which, if sanctioned by law, would either in the particular case or in common experience secure an unconscionable advantage, irrespective of the existence or evidence of actual intent to defraud. Thus, if a trustee takes a conveyance to himself of the trust property, though on paying what he deems its full value into the trust fund, the transaction is constructively fraudulent as to any beneficiaries not having full knowledge, and intelligently and freely assenting, even though his estimate of the value was fair and just; because to sanction such a use of the power of a trustee would in general produce results in legal effect equivalent to actual fraud. — Pious fraud. (a) A fraud or deception practised with the intention of promoting some good object or of sparing pain to the person deceived; a kindly deception.

May is a pious fraud of the almanac.

Louvill, Under the Willows.

(b) A person who talks piously, but is not pious at heart; a religious humbug. [Collog.] — Statute of Frauds, an English statute of 1677, reenacted in varying forms nearly all of the United States, requiring written memoranda to make valid many classes of contracts: the statute being named from its intent to put an end to frauds and perjuries in claiming contracts to have been actually made in cases where there had been only negotiations. — Utmost Frauds Act. See act = Syn. 1. Deceit, Deception, Fraud (see deceit); circumvention, imposition, cheat, cheating.

fraudt (frād), v. t. [ME. frauden, < OF. frauder, F. frauder = Pr. OSp. fraudar = It. fraudare, < L. fraudare, cheat, defraud, < frus (fraud), fraud; see fraud, n. Cf. defraud.] To cheat; defraud.

The hire of your workmen . . . that is fraudt of you.

Congress, tr of Ovid's Art of Love.

Drank till he fested with all ease, and told Free tales Tennyson, Geraldine.

Many of these poems are full of a solemn and deep devotion; others are strangely coarse and free.
Tuckman, Span. Lit., II. 178.

8. Clear of obstruction or impediment; not hindered or restricted; unobstructed: as, free motion; the water has a free passage or channel;
a free field of action.

Free for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified 2 Thes. III. 1.

Free vent of words love a fire doth assuage Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 334.

They bore her . . . free-faced to the free air of heaven,
And laid her in the vault of her own kin.
Tennyson, Laver's Tale, iv.

In the treatment of typhus and typhoid fevers, the freest ventilation, even to the extent of placing the patient in the open air, reduces the mortality more than half, and greatly shortens the time of recovery.
Huxley and Youmans, Physiol., § 393

9. Clear or exempt (from something); having immunity: with from, or sometimes of: as, free from disease, or from faults; a grove free

For me as for you? Shak., T. of the X. I. 2.

Where wert thou when thy father play'd
In his free field, and pasture made,
A merry boy in sun and shade?
Tennyson, Two Voices.

11. Specifically, not encumbered with taxes or customs-duties.

We are living under a system in which our imports alone are free, our exports for some of the principal markets not being free.

Quoted in Nineteenth Century, XIX. 384

12. Gratuitous; without compensation or reward; clear of equivalent or reciprocity: as, free schools or education; a free table; a free gift or service.

"I take it as free gift, then," said the boy,
"Not guerdon." Tennyson, Geraldine.

Free Church, more fully Free Church of Scotland, a large and important body of Presbyterians, organized at Edinburgh, Scotland, at the disruption in 1843, when over 200 ministers, members of the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland, after the reading of a protest, formally withdrew with a large following of adherents to another meeting-place, and constituted the first general assembly of a church that should be free from state connection, the interference of the civil courts in spiritual matters, and the evils of patronage, while still maintaining the Confession of Faith and the standards of the Church of Scotland. The Act of Separation and Deed of Demission by which the new organization cut loose from the Established Church was signed by 474 ministers and professors, who renounced all claim to the bene-fices they held. The Free Church ranks as second to the Established Church in the number of its congregations and membership. Abbreviated F. C. See disruption.

In one sense the Free Church dates its existence from the Disruption of 1843, in another it claims to be the rightful representative of the National Church of Scotland as it was reformed in 1640. Engel, Hist., IX. 742.

Free church, a church in which the pews or sittings are not rented, but are open to all.—Free city, see city.—

slaves. Free love, the doctrine, maintained by some persons and associations, of the rightfulness of free choice in sexual relations, without the restraint of legal marriage or of any continuing obligation independent of individual will. This doctrine, under different names, but generally as part of a religious creed, has been more or less advocated and practiced in many periods and countries; but the above name was probably first applied to it in the United States. Free Methodist. See Methodist.—Free restricted trade; especially, trade or commerce between different countries free from restrictions or customs-duties, in a narrower and more common use, international trade free from protective or discriminative duties, trade subject only to such tariffs and regulations as are necessary for revenue and police. Complete freedom of trade between the several States is prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. See protection. Free trade and sailors' rights, a popular cry throughout the United States in the years immediately preceding and during the war of 1812. It was a protest against first, the restrictions which were laid upon neutral commerce, and the con-fiscations which followed any violation of these restrictions, by the warring nations, France and Great Britain; and, secondly, the right of search for British seamen on American vessels, which Great Britain claimed as her prerogative and repeatedly carried into execution.—Free veins, freedom (frē'dūm), n. [< ME. freedom, freedom, AS. frōdom (= OFries. frīdom, Nīries. frīdom = D. vrijdom = MLG. frīdom, LG. frīdom = MHG. frīdom, freedom, < frēa, free, + -dom, -dōm.)]

1. The state or character of being free. (a) Exempt from the constraint or restraint of physical or moral forces, the state of being able to act without external controlling interference: liberty. In a special sense, exemption from bondage or imprisonment.

I also must change
Their nature, and revoke the high decrees, Unchangeable, eternal, which ordain'd
Their freedom; they themselves ordain'd their fall.
Milton, P. L., III, 125.

In this then consists freedom: viz., in our being able to act or not to act, according as we shall choose or will. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xxi, 47.

The doctrine of Freedom was first elaborated into a metaphysical scheme, implying its opposite Necessity, by St. Augustin against Pelagius; and in a later age was disputed between Arminians and Calvinists, being for centuries a capital controversy both in Theology and in Metaphysics. A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 482.

(b) Exemption from arbitrary, despotic, or autocratic control, especially in civil matters; independence; civil liberty.

A! freedom is a nobill thing!
Freedom maye man to haiff liking! . . .
He levys at ease that frely livys.

Barbour, Bruce.

If you deny it, let the danger light
Upon your charter, and your city's freedom.

Shak., M. of V., IV, 1.

Grant him this, and the Parliament hath no more freedom then if it were in his Noose.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvii.

By a declaration of rights, I mean one which shall stipulate freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce against monopolies, trial by juries in all cases, no suspensions of the habeas corpus, no standing armies. These are fetters against doing evil which no honest government should decline.

Jefferson, Correspondence, II, 231.

For what avail the plough or sallow,
Or land or life, if freedom fail?

Keats, Centennial Poem.

(c) Frankness; openness; outspokenness; unrestrictedness.

You shall
This morning come before us: where, I know,
You cannot with such freedom purge yourself
But that . . . you must take Your patience to you.

Shak., Hen. VIII, v, 1.

This thought of Monsieur Merri's has made a great breach betwixt Monsieur Verney and himself; for which reason I had not that freedom of conversation as I could have wish'd with both of them.

Lester, Journey to Paris, p. 67.

So wold this William neuer on withhold to him selve.

William of Palerne (L. E. T. S.), I, 189.

2. The possession of particular privileges; franchise; immunity: as, the freedom of a city or of a corporation.

It was lately proposed in the city to present him [the Duke of Hamilton] with the freedom of some company.

Walpole, Letters, II, 45.

3. A free, unconditional grant; a free privilege or franchise. [Rare.]—4. In math., capability of displacement in space. — Kind of freedom. See body. — Degree of freedom, in math., an independent mode in which a body may be displaced. Thus, a wheel the axis of which is fixed, or a roller which is compelled to roll on the ground without sliding or turning, has but one degree of freedom—that is, it can move only forward or back. If it can turn without sliding or sliding without turning, either in the direction of its rolling or in that of its axis, it has two degrees of freedom: if it is capable of all these motions, it has four degrees of freedom. If one end of it can rise above the surface of the ground, it has five; if both ends can leave the ground, it has six degrees of freedom and is perfectly free.—Freedom of repeat, a free, unconditional recall.

I kiss thy hand, but not in flattery, Caesar; Dwelling thee that Publius Cimber may Have an immediate freedom of repeat.

Shak., J. C., III, 1.

Freedom of the will. See will. — Syn. 1. Freedom, Liberty, Independence: scope, range, play, swing, latitude. The first three words are sometimes used as synonyms, but they are clearly distinguishable. Freedom is the most general in its application. Liberty is commonly used where reference is made to past or possible physical confinement or restriction: as, the prisoners were set at liberty. Freedom is used where emphasis is laid upon freeness (fré'nes), n. The state or quality of being free, unconstrained, or unobstructed; openness; unreservedness; frankness; ingenuousness; candor; liberality; gratuitousness.

Freeness of speech is when we speak boldly and with out fear, even to the proudest of them, whatsoever we please or have list to speak.
Sir T. Wilson, Art of Rhetoric, p. 263.

He was a clear master of the novel freedom and infallible efficacy of divine grace in the conversion of souls.
Bates, Funeral Sermon of Baxter.

freer (fré'ér), n. One who frees or gives freedom. R. Jonson.

freeret, n. A Middle English form of frear.

Freesia (fré'si-á), n. [NL.] A genus of iridescent bulbous plants of the Cape of Good Hope, allied to Gladiolus. There are two species, frequently cultivated.

free-soil (fré'soi'), a. In favor of free soil or territory—that is, opposed to slavery. An epithet applied to a party of the principles of a party in the United States who opposed the extension of slavery into the Territories, or those parts of the country which had not yet been erected into States. The Free soil party arose out of a coalition of the Liberty party with the Barnburners in 1848, and, with the addition of Whigs, Know nothings, and some Democrats, became in 1854 the Republican party. It nominated candidates for the presidency in 1848 and 1852.

The Liberty party was merged in the Free soil, whose creed was the exclusion of slavery from the Territories.
G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, I. 3.

Free-soiler (fré'soi-lér), n. [< free-soil + -er.] In U. S. hist., a member of the Free soil party; one who advocated the non-extension of slavery.

The shibboleth of this party (nominating Van Buren) was "Free Soil, Free Speech, Free Labor, and Free Men." It was, of course, anti-slavery, but its adherents took the name of "Free soilers." A. Sargent, Public Men, II. 334.

free-soilism (fré'soi-lizm), n. [< free-soil + -ism.] The principles of the Free-soilers.

During the anti-slavery agitation in Kansas, Senator Atchison, formerly the presiding officer of the United States Senate, openly advised the people of Missouri to go and vote in Kansas. General Sumner told them to take their bowie knives and exterminate every scoundrel who was tainted with Free-soilism or Abolitionism.
J. F. Clarke, N. A. Rev., CXX. 1.

free-spoken (fré'spo-kn), a. Given to freedom of speech; accustomed to speak without hesitancy or reserve.

The emperor [Nerva] fell into discourse of the injustice and tyranny of the former time, and said, What should we do with them if we had them now? One of them that were at supper, and was a free-spoken senator, said, Marry, they should sup with us.
Bacon, Apophthegms.

"Am I but false as Guinevere is pure?
Or art thou mazed with dreams? or being one
Of our free-spoken Table hast not heard That Lancelot?" there he checked himself, and paused.
Emerson, Fables and Fables.

free-spokenness (fré'spó-kn-nes), n. The quality of being free-spoken. Thackeray.

free-standing (fré'stan-ding), a. Detached; isolated; as, free-standing statues.

The absence of the wooden ornaments of the external porch, as well as our ignorance of the mode in which the temple was finished laterally, and the porch joined to the main temple, prevents us from judging what the effect of the front would have been if belonging to a free standing building.
J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 121.

freestone (fré'ston), n. and a. I. n. 1. Any species of stone composed of sand or grit, as the brownstone or brown sandstone of the eastern United States, much used in building; so called because it is easily quarried.

I saw her hand, she has a leathern hand,
A freestone colour'd hand, I verily did think That her old gloves were on, but 'twas her hands.
Shak., As you like it, IV. 3.

One [building] is very spacious and broad, and of a great height, adorned with many goodly pillars of white freestone.
Corjay, Traditions, I. 30.

The walls of the city are of large square freestone, the most neat and best in repair I ever saw.
 Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 30, 1644.

2. A freestone peach: distinguished from cling-stone. See II.

II. a. Having, as a fruit, a stone from which the flesh of the fruit separates readily and cleanly, as distinguished from the quality of having a stone to which the flesh clings or adheres firmly: as, a freestone peach.

free-swimmer (fré'swim-er), n. A fish that swims high, or near the surface of the water, as the herring and other clupeids.

All free-swimmers are especially heedful to avoid contact with the bottom.
Goode, Menhaden, p. 67.

free-swimming (fré'swim-ing), a. Swimming freely: said of any aquatic animal that is not fixed, and particularly of those which are attached at some period of their lives and free at another: as, the free-swimming embryo of a cirriped; the free-swimming adult of a crinoid.

freit, freit (fré't), n. [Also fré't; < leel, frétt, news, intelligence, inquiry, inquiry about the future; cf. leel, frétt = Dan. frétt, question, interrogate; ODan. fréttir, an interrogator; prob. ult. akin to E. frail, q. v.] 1. A superstitious notion or belief with respect to any action or event as a good or a bad omen.

Freits follow them 'at freits follow. Scotch proverb.
Syne that herd, that Maklaith ay
In fantown freits had gret fay.
Winton, VI. 18, 362. (Jamieson.)

2. A superstitious observance or practice.

All kinds of practices, freits, or other extraordinary actions, which cannot abide the true touch of natural reason.
Kant, Janus, Demonology, p. 169.

[Scotch in both senses.]

free-tailed (fré'táld), a. Having the tail free from the interfemoral membrane to a considerable extent or entirely, as a bat; emballomurine.

free-thinker (fré'thing'kér), n. One who is not guided in the formation of his beliefs by obedience to authority, but submits the claims of authority to reason as the ultimate arbiter. The early application of the term was to those who occupied a rationalistic position in regard to current religious beliefs and dogmas, hence it acquired the still current sense of skeptic, infidel, and even atheist. The word, though employed earlier, is generally supposed to have been brought into common use in 1773 by the publication of Anthony Collins's "A Discourse of Free-thinking, occasioned by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Freethinkers." Although this work defines free-thinker as the endeavor to judge a proposition according to the weight of evidence, and does not explicitly maintain any proposition which can offend a Protestant, it was rightly judged to be a covert attack upon fundamental tenets of the Christian religion. The free thinkers specifically so called formed a class of deistical writers in England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the chief of whom were Toland (died 1722), Anthony Collins (1676-1729), Woolston (1693-1733), Tindal (died 1733), and Bolingbroke (1688-1751). See deist.

The idiot is supposed to say in his heart what David a fool did some thousands of years ago and was therefore designed as a proper representative of those among us who are called atheists and infidels by others, and free thinkers by themselves. Adison, Religions in Waxwork.

Is he a hur-human? then he's fond of power.
A quaker? sly, a Presbyterian? soon
A smart free thinker? all things in an hour.
Pope, Moral Essays, I. 157.

The free-thinker perhaps too has imbibed his principles from the persons among whom he was bred up.
A. Tucker, Light of Nature, V. xvi.

Who born within the last forty years has read a word of Collins and Toland and Tindal and that whole race who called themselves freethinkers?
Burke, Rev. in France.

If Collins included as freethinkers all who differed from the prevalent creed of the time, Bentley would not deny that freethinkers had done good service. If on the other hand, Collins meant, as Bentley assumed him to innuendate, that all these freethinkers were atheists, then he was palpably wrong.
Leadbetter, Stephen, Emancipation, IV. 14.

Syn. Free-thinker, Skeptic, etc. See infidel.

free-thinking (fré'thing'king), n. The act or the habit of inquiring freely into the truth of a fact or point of faith in which authority requires implicit belief; especially applied to skeptical inquiry into the supernatural elements of Christianity.

Collins's Discourse on Free-thinking discusses the relation of reason to the acceptance and the interpretation of revelation, with great acuteness and ability, in a spirit not too liable to much of the current theology of the time.
N. Porter, App. to Ueberweg's Hist. Philos., p. 376.

free-thinking (fré'thing'king), a. Holding the principles of a free-thinker; untrammelled or bold in speculation; hence, deistical; skeptical.

free-tongued (fré'tungd), a. Given to speaking freely and without reserve.

The free-tongued preacher must either live by air or be forced to change his pasture.
Sp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, III. 7.

free-trader (fré'trá'dér), n. One who advocates or believes in free trade. See free trade, under free, a.

freety, freity (fré'ti), a. [Also written fretty; < fret, fréit, + -y.] Superstitious; of or belonging to superstitions. [Scotch.]

I knew the man whose mind was deeply imbued with the superstitious and freety observances of his native land.
Edinburgh Mag., Sept., 1816, p. 154.

freewarren (fré'wó'ren), n. In Eng. law, a royal franchise or exclusive right of killing beasts and fowls of warren within certain limits.

freewill (fré'wil), n. and a. I. n. See free will, under will.

II. a. 1. Made, performed, or done freely or of one's own motion or accord; voluntary.

Churchmen in those Ages liv'd merely upon free-will offerings.
Milton, Touching Hirelings.

The basket of fruit of the juvenile Talfourd [did] not displease me: not that I have any thoughts of bartering or reciprocating these things. To send him anything in return would be to reflect suspicion of mercenariness upon what I know he meant a freewill offering.
Lamb, To Wordsworth.

2. Of or pertaining to the metaphysical doctrine of the freedom of the will: as, the free-will controversy. See will.

I persist in saying, with Sir W. Hamilton, that on the free-will doctrine volitions are emancipated from causation altogether. J. S. Mill, Exam. of Hamilton, xvi.

Freewill Baptist. See Baptist.

free-willed (fré'wíld), a. Endowed with freedom of the will.

In vain we think that free-willed Man has Power
To hasten or protract the appointed Hour.
Pratt, Ode to George Villiers.

free-willer (fré'wíll-er), n. In Maryland, during the colonial period, an immigrant who had voluntarily sold his labor under contract for a certain number of years.

freewoman (fré'wum'-an), n.; pl. freewomen (-wim'-en). A woman not a slave.

Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman.
Gal. IV. 22.

free-writer (fré'ri-tér), n. A free-thinking writer. See free-thinker. Shaffersbury. [Rare.]

freezable (fré'z-á-bl), a. [< freeze + -able.] Capable of being frozen.

freeze (fréz), v.; pret. froze, pp. frozen or froze, ppr. freezing. [Early mod. E. also frise, frisee; < ME. fressen, fressen, fressen (pret. fress, fresse, and weak fressede, pl. not found, pp. fressen), < AS. fressan (pret. fress, pl. fressan, pp. fressen) = D. fressen = MLG. fressen, LG. fressen = OHG. fressan, fressan, fressan, fressan, fressan, fressan, fressan = leel. fressa = Sw. frysa = Dan. fryse = Goth. fressan (evidenced by deriv. fress, frost, cold), freeze = L. prurire (orig. prurire, itch (orig. sting, as with cold), cf. pruna (orig. prunus), hoar frost, pruna (orig. prunus), a burning coal, cf. Skt. prush, burn, prush, sprinkle, prushra, a drop, frozen drop, hoar frost. Hence frost, and frore, pp.] I. trans. 1. To congeal; harden into ice; change from a fluid to a solid form by cold or abstraction of heat.

Whenicles hang by the wall,
And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,
And Tom bears logs into the hall,
And milk comes frozen home in pail.
Shak., L. L. L., v. 2 (song).

2. To affect with frost; stiffen, harden, injure, kill, etc., by congealing the fluid portions of; hence, to produce some analogous effect in.

I could a tale unfold, whose lightest word
Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood.
Shak., Hamlet, I. 5.

Elfin, . . . ascending by Simony to the Chair of Canterbury, and going to Rome the same year for his Pall, was frozen to Death in the Alps.
Milton, Hist. Eng., v.

As a knight of old, at the very moment when he would have unhorsed his opponent, was often frozen into unjust inactivity by the king's arbitrary signal for parting the tilers.
De Quincey, Secret Societies, I.

Her loveliness with shame and with surprise, Froze my swift speech. Tennyson, Fair Women.

3. To chill with cold; produce the sensation of intense cold in. — To freeze in, to entangle or envelop in ice, as, the vessels were frozen in earlier than usual.

Six vessels lay frozen in at a considerable distance from the town.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 193.

To freeze out, to drive out or off; compel to withdraw or retire, as a person from society by cold or contemptuous treatment, a man from business by severe competition or opposition, or a body of stockholders by depressing the stock. [Colloq., U. S.]

Jealousy on the part of Western stockholders, and an insane fear that Colt would freeze them all out, delayed the erection of this [mining] machinery.

Quoted in Howry's Arizona and Sonora, p. 38.
The Baltimore and Ohio, only a short time ago, froze out the Inter-State Telegraph Company.

Electrical Rev. (Amer.), XII. 11.

II. Intrans. 1. To be congealed by cold; be changed from a liquid to a solid state by the abstraction of heat; be hardened into ice or into a solid body by cold: as, water freezes at the temperature of 32° F.

There is a nother Ryvere, that upon the nygt freezeth wonder faste.
Manderiville, Travels, p. 125.

The sculptured dead, on each side, seem to freeze,
Imprison'd in black, purgatorial rails.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, II.

2. To be of that degree of cold at which water congeals: often used impersonally to describe the state of the weather: as, it is freezing to-night.

Freeze, freeze, thou lither sky,
Thou dost not bite so nigh
As benefits forgot.
Shak., As you Like It, II. 7 (song)

3. To suffer the effects of intense cold; be stiffened, hardened, or impaired by cold.

Such rage as winters reigneth in my heart,
My life-bloud freezes with unkindly cold.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., January.

4. Figuratively, to be or become chilled; suffer greatly from the sensation of cold.—5. To cause a sensation of great cold. [Rare.]

The wand ring rivis gaze with cars oppress'd,
And chilling horrors freeze in every breast.
Pope, Odyssey, II.

To freeze to (a person or a thing), to attach one's self closely or devotedly to, take possession of. [Colloq. U. S.]

freeze (frēz), v. [freeze, v.] Frost or its results; chilling or freezing conditions: as, there was a strong freeze last night. [Colloq.]

The effects of the late freeze have been severely felt.
Charleston (S.) Newspaper, (Bartlett)

freeze (frēz), n. See freeze.

freezer (frē'zēr), n. One who or that which freezes or chills; a refrigerator; especially, a contrivance, as a vessel containing a freezing-mixture, for producing a freezing temperature in substances exposed to its influence, as cream.

The books . . . looked, in their cold, hard, slippery uniforms, as if they had but one life among them, and that was a freezer.
Dickens, Dombey and Son, V.

freezing (frē'zing), n. [Verbal n. of freeze, v.] The act of hardening, congealing, or solidifying with cold; freezing or chilling treatment.

And winter increasing with many great snows and freezing of the earth, there fell on him another malady.
Golden Book, xxxviii.

What freezings have I felt, what dark days seen!
What old December's harshness everywhere!
Shak., Sonnets, xcvi

freezing (frē'zing), p. a. [Prp. of freeze, v.]

1. Such as to freeze; specifically, at or below the temperature of 32° F. (0° C.), which is called the freezing-point, because water freezes at that temperature; in general, very cold: as, freezing weather.—2. Figuratively, haughty; stern; chilling: as, freezing politeness.

freezing-box (frē'zing-bōks), n. A box in which fish are frozen.

freezingly (frē'zing-li), adv. In a freezing or chilling manner.

A crowded and attentive House, which, whilst freezingly deprecatory, remained politely attentive.
R. J. Hinton, Eng. Radical Leaders, p. 35

freezing-mixture (frē'zing-mik's'tūr), n. A mixture that has the property of producing a sufficient degree of cold—that is, a sufficiently rapid absorption of heat—to freeze liquids. In general, such a mixture consists of a solid and a liquid in which the solid rapidly dissolves—for example, hydrochloric acid and sodium sulphate. Its effect is due to the fact that the change of a solid to a liquid requires a certain amount of heat (see latent heat, under heat), and if this change goes on rapidly a considerable lowering of temperature results. In the common case of pounded ice and salt, which gives a temperature of about 0° F. (-15° C.), there is a double change, both resulting in the absorption of heat—the melting of the ice and the solution of the salt. See ice-machine.

freezing-point (frē'zing-point), n. The temperature at which a liquid freezes; loosely, the temperature at which ice melts. The freezing-point, in the strict sense, depends on many circumstances difficult to control, and many liquids, including water, can with care be cooled several degrees below their melting points without freezing. The melting-point of ice (water), however, is relatively fixed and readily observed. Consequently, the melting-point is always substituted for the freezing-point in making thermometers, although it is generally called by the latter name.

The freezing-point of water and the melting-point of ice, as Professor Tyndall remarks, touch each other as it were.
J. Croft, Climate and Time, p. 567.

Fregata, Fregatta (frē-gat'ā, gat'ā), n. [NL., < F. frégate, a frigate: see frigate.] A genus of birds, the frigate-pelicans, forming the type and only representative of the family Fregatidae: same as Tachypterus. See cut under frigate-bird.

Fregatidæ (frē-gat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Fregata + -idæ.] A family of totipalmate birds, of the group Steganopodes, having very long pointed wings, very long forked tail, and extremely short tarsi; the frigate-pelicans. Also called Tachypodæ.

Fregatta, n. See Fregata.

fregiatura (frā-jā-tō'rā), n.; pl. fregiature (-rē). [It., trimming, ornament, < frigare, trim, adorn, < ML. frigare, phrygare, embroider with gold, < frigum, phrygum, gold embroidery, Phrygian work: see auriphygia.] In music, an ornament; an embellishment.

Fregilus (frē'jī-lus), n. [NL.] A genus of corvine passerine birds with black plumage and red bill and feet; the choughs. F. graeculus is the common chough. Also called Pyrrhocorax and Coracia. See cut under chough.

Freia (frē'yā), n. [NL.] 1. A genus of arachnids. C. D. Koch, 1850.—2. In Protozoa, same as Folliculina. Claparède and Lachmann, 1856.

Freibergite (frī'bērg-it), n. [Freiberg (see def.) + -ite.] A variety of tetrahedrite containing several per cent. of silver; named from Freiberg in Saxony.

freieslebenite (fri-es-la'bn-it), n. [Named after Johann Karl Freiesleben (1774-1846), a distinguished Saxon geologist.] A native sulphid of antimony, lead, and silver, occurring in prismatic crystals of a light steel-gray color and metallic luster, and easily cut by a knife.

freight (frāt), n. [late ME. freight, freyt, an altered form of fraught, prob. due to the influence of F. fret: see fraught, n.] 1. The cargo, or any part of the cargo, of a ship; lading; that which is carried by water: in the United States and Canada, in general, anything carried for pay either by water or by land; the lading of a ship, canal-boat, railroad-car, wagon, etc.

You sail, that, from the sky mixt wave,
Down on the sigh, and waite the royal youth,
Freight of future glory to my shore.
Thomson, Britannia.

The bark, that ploughs the deep, serene,
Clad with a freight transcending its worth
The gems of India, Nature's rarest birth,
A herald of God's love to pay a tribute.

2. The price paid for the transportation of goods or merchandise by sea; by extension, in the United States and Canada, in general, the price paid for the transportation of goods or merchandise by land or by sea.

Each is cheap, freights are extremely low, and there, with many other advantages, offer unusual opportunities to merchants and manufacturers.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 118

3. In a more general sense, the price paid for the use of a ship, including the transportation of passengers. By freight, by the usual public conveyance or means of transport, as a freight of goods, opposed to express, as, shall it be sent by freight or express? [U. S.] Dead freight, fast freight, etc. See the adjectives.

freight (frāt), v. t. [freight, v.] 1. To load or lade with goods or merchandise for transportation; often used figuratively.

I had from you lately two letters, the last was well freighted with very good stuff, but the other too plain, ly with you, was not so.
Howell, Letters, II. 21.

Each vessel freighted with a several load
Each squadron waiting for a several whod
Drake, Anne Marabilla, act 206

Every page is brightened with wit, ennobled by sentiment, freighted with knowledge, or decorated with imagery.
Whipple, Lib. and Rev., I. 13

2. To hire for the transportation of goods or merchandise.—3. To carry or transport as freight.

Each of these Rooms compactly stores a ship's cargo, to one of two Merchants or more, and every Man freight his Goods in his own Room.
Dampier, Voyages, I. 412

A water that looked so quiet perhaps three thousand miles, and kept in stock for months, undergoing unknown changes all the time.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 121

freight (frāt), p. a. [Also freight; var. of fraught.] Same as fraught.

freightage (frāt'āj), n. [freight + -age.] 1. Freight; lading; cargo; also used figuratively.

English ships laden with full freightage of a gallant and glib.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 11

Coal as an up freightage is fully as important as the down cargo of grain.
Harper's Mag., LXXI. 190.

2. The carrying or transportation of merchandise, etc.

All travel and freightage are still, as of old, conducted by means of horses, asses, camels, and mules.
Harper's Mag., LXXII. 216.

3. Money paid for the carriage of goods or merchandise; charge for the transportation of goods. See freight, n., 2.

No more than one-half of the duty of freightage shall be expended toward the payment of their debts.

Milton, Letters of State, To the K. of Portugal.

freight-car (frāt'kār), n. A railroad-car for carrying freight, commonly a box-car. Called in Great Britain a goods-wagon or goods-van.

freight-engine (frāt'en'jin), n. A locomotive used for drawing freight-trains. [U. S.]

freighter (frāt'tēr), n. 1. One who freights or chartered a ship for the transportation of goods or merchandise; a shipper.

He represented in behalf of himself and other owners and freighters of the London gally, that the said gally sailed from Jamaica the latter end of February last.

Parliamentary Hist., 6 Anne, 1706. The Lord's Address.

2. One who sends goods by land or by sea, either for himself or for others. See freight, n., 2.

The local trader or the agricultural freighter.
Contemporary Rev., LI. 81

Men employed by the freighters to look after the mules during the night to prevent their straying off.
The American, IX. 110

3. A ship or vessel engaged in the carrying-trade.

The ship "Maria" . . . been at that period employed as a freighter. C. M. Scammon, Marine Mammals, p. 244.

Heavily loaded freighters were lurching in, every mile standing in his collar, every trace taut and quivering.
The Century, XXXI. 68.

freight-house (frāt'hous), n. A house or depot for freight. [U. S.] Syn. Station, etc. See depot.

freighting (frāt'ing), n. [Verbal n. of freight, v.] The carriage or transportation of freight; freightage.

In the rainy season, the water flowing down from the various ravines and from the Salto (the corner of the San Miguel) fills the arroyo, and renders freighting in wagons difficult, but does not impede transit by mules and pack-trains.
L. Hamilton, Mexican Handbook, p. 67.

freighting (frāt'ing), p. a. [Prp. of freight, v.] Concerned with the carrying of freight or merchandise.

At the beginning of that war (as in the commencement of every war) traders were struck with a sort of panic. Many went out of the freighting business.
Bruce, Late State of the Nation.

freightless (frāt'les), a. Destitute of freight.

freight-train (frāt'train), n. A train of freight-cars. Called in Great Britain a goods-train.

fremd (fremd), a. and n. [North. E. and Sc., also frem, fremt, fremot, fremot, etc.; < ME. fremd, fremd, fremde, fremde, < AS. fremde, fremde, fremthe = OE. fremtha = OFries. fremd, fremd = D. fremd = MLG. fremde, fremde = OHG. fremidi, fremidi, MHG. fremede, fremde, G. fremd (Ael). fremandi = Sw. fremmande = Dan. fremmand, appar. < LG. or G. = Goth. fremath, strange, foreign, < Goth. AS., etc., frem, E. from: see from.] 1. a. 1. Strange; foreign.

A faucon peregrin that seemed she
Of fremde lands. Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 421.

What freme can this (thou) freme be, swine,
Wt' us this night to guest?
Romney Haymond (Child's Ballads), I. 264.

2. Not akin; unrelated.

Many are that never have held the order of knighthood, but their tendency is to freme, but neither they like them nor will of they hate them nor will of them.
Hampele, Prime Treasures (C. D. 1. 8), p. 8.

I saw not how the freme could dwell among them, seeing that they were freme in heart if they were kin in blood.
Mrs. Alphant.

3. Strange; singular; queer.

Never was there a freme so formed a man.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1046.

Better my friend think me freme
Than fashion.
Hampele's Scotch Proverbs.

4. Wild; unfriendly; unfriendly.
Chaucer, Troilus, III. 529.

The fremd, strangers, the strange world: as, to go into the fremd to go among strangers, and of any one leaving the family in which he was brought up and going into the service of strangers. [Dialect.]

II. f n. A stranger; a foreigner or an alien.

So now his trend is changed for a freme.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., April.

As perjured towards in adversity,
With sight of fear, from friends to fremd do fly.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, I.

fremedly, adv. [ME.; < fremed, fremd, + -ly.] As a stranger.

You are going to quit me without warning — French leave. Is that British conduct? Bulwer, What will he do with it?, 10.

II. n. 1. The language spoken by the people of France. French is parallel with Provençal, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Wallachian, and minor dialects, called together the Romanic languages, being descended from the Latin as spoken by the Romans and the peoples of the various provinces whom they brought under their dominion, mingled with the Celtic and Teutonic tongues with which Latin was thus brought in contact. (See Romance.) Frenchmen the language of the Franks, a Teutonic people merged with the mixed races of Gaul, who received the Frankish name (the country being then called France), but retained their Romanic speech, the Franks and other Teutonic tribes, and later the Normans, accepting the speech of the people they conquered. It is divided chronologically into Old French and modern French, the former extending from the ninth century to the fourteenth, or, with the convenient inclusion (as usual) in this dictionary of what is specifically called Middle French, to the sixteenth century. Old French existed in many dialects, the phrase, indeed, when unqualified or unabbreviated, including the aggregate of such dialects. The most important were the dialect of the Île de France, which, as the "French of Paris," has become the modern literary French; and that of Normandy, the Norman or Norman French, which, transferred to England at the Conquest and there developed (as Anglo-French), gave much to and took much from the English, and was finally displaced by the mixed English speech thus formed. (See English.) By later borrowing from French, or from the Latin on the French model, the Romanic part of the English vocabulary is now to a great extent nearly identical with that of French. As the most central and highly developed of the Romance dialects, French began, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, to take the place of Latin as the general language of diplomacy, polite society, and commerce. Its importance in this respect has much diminished in the present century. It now draws upon by other languages chiefly for terms of the art, dress, and cookery. The use of accents as a customary part of French orthography began in the seventeenth century; they now form a rigid artificial system, often a guide to pronunciation, and reflecting generally, but with numerous exceptions, previous etymologic conditions of the words concerned. Regarded as a Romance language, French is remarkable for its departure from the Latin type. In its vowel and consonant system (notably in its nasal vowels), its sweeping contractions, and its general destruction of final sounds or syllables, with the retention in many cases of these lost sounds in spelling, it differs markedly from other Romance tongues.

And French ache spak ful faire and fetysly,
After the scole of Stratford atte Bowe,
For French of Parys was to hire unknowe. Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T. (ed. Morris), l. 124.

Freycinetia (frä-si-nē'shi-ä), n. [NL., named after Louis Claude de Saulx de Freycinet, a French naval officer and explorer (1779-1842).] A genus of frutescent or climbing plants, of the natural order Pandanaceae, of which there are about 30 species in southeastern Asia, Australia, and the adjacent islands. Some species are occasionally found in greenhouses.

friability (fri-a-bil'i-ti), n. [= F. friabilité = Sp. friabilidad = Pg. friabilidade = It. friabilità; as friable + -ity: see -bility.] The quality of being friable, or easily broken, crumbled, or reduced to powder.

friable (fri'a-bl), a. [= F. friable = Sp. friable = Pg. friavel = It. friabile, < L. friabilis, easily crumbled or broken, < frare, rub, crumble.] Easily crumbled or pulverized; easily reduced to powder, as pumice.

A light friable ground, or moist gravel.

Edgyn, Sylvia, Of the Chess-nut.

For the liver, of all the viscera, is the most friable and easily crumbled or dissolved.

Arbuthnot, On Diet, III.

The pollen-masses are extremely friable, so that large portions can easily be broken off.

Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 96.

friableness (fri'a-bl-nes), n. Friability.

friar (fri'är), n. [Early mod. E. also frier: < ME. frier, < OF. friere, frere, F. friere = Pr. fraire, frar, frai = Sp. fraile, fray = Pg. frei = It. frate, fra, brother, monk, friar, < L. frater, brother, ML. a monk, friar, etc., = E. brother: see brother, frater, fraternal, etc. For the form, cf. brur, briar, < ME. brere.] 1. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a member of one of the mendicant monastic orders. The four orders whose members are chiefly known as friars are the Franciscans (Friars Minor or Gray Friars), Dominicans (Friars Major, Friars Preachers, or Black Friars), Carmelites (White Friars), and Augustinians (Austin Friars). The members of some minor orders are also so called, as the Minims and Servites.

Holy writ bit men be war and wisliche hem kepe,
That no false frere thorw flatteryng hem by-gyle.

Piers Plowman (C) xvi. 77.

It was the friar of orders gray.

As he forth walked on his way
Shak., T. of the S., IV. 1 (song).

2. [In allusion to Gray or White Friar.] In printing, a gray or indistinct spot or patch in print, usually made by imperfect inking; distinguished from monk.

The print will be too pale or gray in places, such imperfections being called friars.
Engc. Int., XXIII. 706.

3. An Irish name of the angler, Lophius piscatorius. — 4. A fish of the family Atherinidae. — 5. The friar-bird or leatherhead. See friar-bird.

Begging friars. See mendicant orders, under mendicant. — Crutched, crouched, or crossed friars (ML. Cruciatii), a minor order of friars, the canons regular of the Holy Cross, so named on account of an embroidered cross which they wore on their garments. — Friars' balsam, an alcoholic solution of benzoin, styrax, (oleo balsam, and aloes, used as a stimulating application for wounds and ulcers. It is equivalent to the tincture of benzoin compound of the United States and British pharmacopoeias. — Friar's chicken, chicken-broth with eggs dropped in it, or eggs beaten and mixed with it. Also called fried-chicken. [Scotch.]

My lady-in-waiting . . . shall make some friar's chicken, or something very light. I would not advise wine.
Scott, Old Mortality, xxi.

Gray friar. See Franciscan. — Preaching friar. See Black-friar and Dominican. — White friar. (a) A Carmelite. (b) A small flake of light-colored sediment floating in wine.

If the cork be musty, or whites friars in your liquor, your master will save the more.

Serv. Directions to Servants, I.

friar-bird (fri'är-bërd), n. The leatherhead or four-o'clock, Tropidorkhynchus coriaceous.

an Australian bird commonly referred to the family Meliphagidae: so called from the bareness of the head and neck. Also called monk, monk-bird, pimlico, and poor soldier.

Fricard (Trochiloides nuchus corniculatus).

fricard (fri'kard), n. [< friar + -ling]. A diminutive of friar.

I have laboured with mine own hands, and will labour, and will that all my fricards shall labour, and live of their labour, whereby they may support themselves in an honest means. Pease, Martyrs, p. 381.

fricard (fri'kard), a. [Formerly also fricard: < friar + -ly]. Like a friar; pertaining to friars; monkish.

This is a fricard fashion. Latimer, 5th Sermon bet. Edw. VI., 1540.

Have no abstract or fricard contempt of (riches), . . . but distinguish, as Cicero saith well of Rabirius Posthumus. Bacon, Riches (ed. 1857).

The Stoics . . . founded their satisfaction upon a scornful and fricard contempt of everything. Sp. Parker, Platonick Philoa (ed. 1667), p. 16.

fricard-rusht, n. A kind of Christmas game. Declaration of Popish Impostures (1603). (Nares.)

fricard's-cap (fri'kard-kap), n. The wolf's-bane, Aconitum Napellus, so called from its hooded sepals. See Aconitum.

fricard's-cowl (fri'kard-koul), n. The wake-robin, Arum maculatum; so called from its cowl-like spathe. See Arum.

fricard's-crown, fricard's-thistle (fri'kard-krown, -this'l), n. The woolly-headed thistle, Cnicus criphorus.

fricard-skate (fri'kard-skāt), n. The Raja alba, a kind of skate or ray. [Local, Eng.]

fricard's-lantern (fri'kard-lan'tern), n. The ignis fatuus or will-o'-the-wisp.

She was plinched and pulled, she sed; And he, by fricard's lantern led. Milton, L'Allegro, l. 104.

fricard's-thistle, n. See fricard's-crown.

fricard (fri'kard), n. and a. [Formerly also fricard, fricard; mod. form, fricard, of fricard, < OF. fricard, F. fricard = It. fratria, < ML. fratria, a fraternity: see frary.] I. n.: pl. fricards (-iz). 1. A convent of friars; a monastery.

There are but 2 Friars in this Frery. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 103.

It was late in the reign of Edward before the parish church and hospital of St. Bartholomew and the new erection of Christ's Hospital, made out of the old fricard, were ready for the reception of distressed poverty and fatherless infancy. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xi.

2. The system of forming into brotherhoods of friars; the practices of friars; monkery. Fuller.

II. a. Pertaining to friars, or to a friary: as, "a fricard cowl," Camden.

It was fashionable for persons of the highest rank to bequeath their bodies to be buried in the fricard churches, which were consequently filled with sumptuous shrines and superb monuments. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, l. 288.

fricard (fri'kard), n. [< L. friatus, pp. of fricare, rub, crumble: see fricard.] The act of crumbling or pulverizing. Colea, 1717.

fricard (fri'kard), a. and n. [Origin unknown; the verb seems to be earlier than the adj., but this may be due to a defect in the records. If the adj. is the original, it may be a more English-looking form for fricard, < OF. fricard, fricard, < L. fricardus, silly, trifling, frivolous: see fricard.] I. a. Frivolous; trifling; silly; contemptible.

The superficial, trivial, and frigid manner in which that fricard minister treated this important branch of administration. British Critic, Jan., 1794.

II. n. 1. A frivolous, trifling person.

That fricard the leader of such men as Fox and Burke! Thackeray, The Four Georges, George IV.

The theory of idlers and dilettanti, of fricards in morals and declaimers in verse, . . . which when accepted by a mature man, and carried along with him through life, is a sure mark of feebleness and of insincerity dealing with himself. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 189.

2. Frivolity; nonsense.

That orator, erst so eloquent, seems now but froth and fricard. Loose, Bismarck, II. 562.

fricard (fri'kard), v.; pret. and pp. fricarded, ppr. fricarding. [See fricard, n.] I. intrans. 1. To trifle; act in a trifling or frivolous manner.

Those who with the stars do fricard. S. Butler, Hudibras, II. III. 58.

The fools that are fricarding round about you. Thackeray.

2. To totter.

How the poor creature fricards in his gait. Tatler, No. 40.

II. trans. To deal with or dispose of in a trifling or frivolous way.

They only take the name of country comedians to abuse simple people with a printed play or two, . . . and what is worse: they speak but what they list of it, and fricard out the rest.

Middleton (and another), Mayor of Queenborough, v. 1.

Here is twenty pieces; you shall fricard them away at the Exchange presently. Shirley, Witty Faint One, iv. 2.

While Lord Melbourne and his whig colleagues . . . were fricarding away their popularity. J. McCarthy, Hist. Own Times, 1 x.

fricardism (fri'kard-izm), n. [< fricard + -ism]. Frivolity. [Rare.]

He distained the fricardism of the French, in adopting the blunders with equal passion as the beauties of the ancients. Goldsmith, Plinian.

fricard (fri'kard), n. A trifle; a coxcomb; a fricard.

They whom my correspondent calls male coxcombs should hereafter be called fricards. A fricard is one who professes rapture and admiration for the woman to whom he addresses, and dreads nothing so much as her consent. Spectator, No. 288.

fricard (fri'kard), p. a. Frivolous; trifling; foolishly captious.

fricard, fricard, n. Same as frithborg.

fricard, fricard, n. [Appr. irreg. < OF. fricard, < L. fricard (n.), a rubbing; see fricard.] Friction.

I will not here speak of ointment used in old time among the Romans and Greeks, in fricard or rubbings. Sir T. Ryot, Castle of Health, II. 32.

You make them smooth and sound, With a bare fricard of your medicine. H. Jonson, Alchemist, III. 2.

fricard, n. [See fricard.] Meat sliced and dressed with strong sauce.

fricard (fri'kard), n.; pl. fricards (-dōz). [Formerly also fricard, < F. fricard, larded veal, etc.; appar. < fricard, fricard, fricard (for fricard), dainty, nice; cf. OF. fricard, appetizing, dainty, F. fricard, a person fond of dainties, fricard, dainties, goodies; perhaps ult. connected with fricard (?).] A thick slice of veal or other meat larded, stewed, and served with a made sauce.

fricard (fri'kard), n. [< F. fricard, fem. of fricard, q. v.] A ball of chopped veal or other meat richly seasoned and fried; a dish prepared of veal, eggs, spices, etc.

fricard, v. t. Same as fricard.

Common sense and truth will not do with them unless they be hashed and fricard. J. Richard, Observations on Ans. to Cont. of Clergy, p. 63.

fricard (fri'kard), n. [< F. fricard, a fricard, any meat fried in a pan, also a charge for a mortar, consisting of stones, bullets, nails, and pieces of old iron mixed with grease and gunpowder; prop. pp. fem. of fricard, fricard, also squander. Usually referred to F. fricard, fricard, fricard, fry, < L. fricare, fry, but this is phonetically improbable. The sense points rather to L. fricare, rub, or to F. fricard, break in pieces; but a connection with either of these verbs has not been made out. Cf. fricard.] A dish made by cutting chickens, rabbits, or other small animals into pieces, and dressing them with a gravy in a frying-pan or a like utensil. Formerly also fricard.

No cook with art, nor cook with physic's force, Nor acts a death in shape of fricard. Garth, Chaucer.

fricard (fri'kard), v. t. [Formerly also fricard, < and fricard; from the noun.] To prepare or dress as a fricard.

fricard (fri'kard), n. [Early mod. E. fricard; < OF. fricard, fricard = Sp. fricard = It. fricard, < L. fricard (n.), < fricare, pp. fricard, rub: see fricard.] The act of rubbing; friction.

Friction is one of the essential, yea, or necessities of mankind, as all the learned affirm: . . . a coarse warm cloth, to chafe or rub the heels, neck, breast, armpits, thighs, &c., . . . is good to open the pores. Bacon's Book (E. K. T. S.), p. 246, note.

Frictions used in the morning serve especially to this intention; but this must evermore accompany them, that after the fricard, the part be lightly anointed with oil. Bacon, Hist. Life and Death.

The like, saith Jordan, we observe in canes and woods that are unctuous and full of oyle, which will yield fire by fricard or collision. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 21.

fricard (fri'kard), a. and n. [< NL. fricard, < L. fricard, pp. of fricare, rub: see fricard.] I. a. 1. Characterized by friction: said of those alphabetic sounds in which the conspicuous element is a rustling of the breath through a partly opened position of the organs, as s and sh, z and zh, f and th, and so on. They are sometimes divided into subclases, as sibilants, like s and sh, and spirants, like f and v. — 2. Sounded by friction, as certain musical instruments. See instrument, 3 (d).

II. n. A fricard consonant. See I., 1.

It has been common of late to describe the sound fricard, v. th in thy, z, etc., as made by means of breath added to tone. Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XV. 40, App.

fricard (fri'kard), n. [< L. fricard, < F. fricard (after fricard, ML. fricard, < fricare (pp. fricard and fricard), rub: see fricard.] A harlot. B. Jonson.

fricard (fri'kard), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A bushel basket. [Prov. Eng.]

Fricle, a basket for fruit that holds about a bushel. Dean Milles, MS. (Halliwell).

fricard (fri'kard), n. [< F. fricard = Sp. fricard = Pg. fricard, < L. fricard (n.), a rubbing, rubbing down (of parts of the body), < L. fricare, pp. fricard, also fricard, rub, rub down.] 1. The rubbing of the surface of one body against that of another; attrition; friction.

Frictions make the parts more flexible and full, as we see both in men and in the currying of horses, &c. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 877.

2. In mech., the resistance to the relative motion, sliding or rolling, of surfaces of bodies in contact: called in the former case sliding, in the latter rolling friction. It is partly due to the adhesion of bodies, but the greater part of it is the result of their roughness. The friction proper is independent of the velocity and of the area of contact; it depends solely upon the nature of the two surfaces and upon the pressure upon them, to which it is directly proportional. What is sometimes called the internal friction of fluids is viscosity (which see). The friction of a fluid upon a solid is considerable; it is now recognized as an important factor in the designing of ships.

3. Figuratively, lack of harmony; mutual irritation; worrying; difficulty.

Many causes, and among them that personal friction which is the despair of all who would make history a science, had produced among the peasantry such intensity of hatred to their lord that they were ready to find allies against him anywhere. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 527.

The whole number of horses for the field armies, some 300,000 would, by the system which prevails, be furnished immediately and without friction. Fortnightly Rev., N. S. XLIII. 35.

Angle of friction. See angle of repose, under angle.

Center of friction. See center. — Friction fremitus. See fremitus. — Friction of rest, the friction and resistance of bodies in contact and at rest with respect to each other when they are compelled to move on one another.

That excess, however, of the friction of rest over the friction of motion, is instantly destroyed by a slight vibration. Booke, 20 and Engage, § 12.

Friction of rolling, or rolling friction, the resistance to the rolling of one surface on another.

Rolling friction is the resistance of uneven surfaces rolling on one another, like that of a wheel rolling on a road. Newton, Elem. of Mechanics, p. 88.

Index or coefficient of friction. See coefficient.

frictional (fri'kard-shun-āl), a. [< friction + -al.] Relating to or of the nature of friction; moved or affected by friction; produced by friction: as, frictional electricity.

If a rigid body rest on a frictional fixed surface, there will in general be only three points of contact. Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., § 508.

Frictional gearing, wheels which catch or bite, and produce motion not by teeth, but by means of friction. With the view of increasing or diminishing the friction, the faces are made more or less V-shaped. See out under friction-gearing.

frictionally (frik' shon-ah-lē), adv. As regards friction.

friction-balls (frik' shon-bālz), n. pl. Balls placed under a heavy object to reduce the friction while that object is moving horizontally. Some forms of swing-bridges have such balls placed under them.

friction-brake (frik' shon-brak), n. 1. A brake acting by friction on some part, as of a moving vehicle.—2. A form of dynamometer invented by Prony.—3. An apparatus for testing the lubricating properties of oils.

friction-breccia (frik' shon-brech' iā), n. In geol., angular or sometimes imperfectly rounded fragments of rock filling more or less completely the cavity left between the sides or walls of a fault or fissure. This material may have been torn from the walls as one of the results of the violent motion to which the rock was subjected at the time the fissure originated, or it may have fallen in from above after the cavity had been formed. Mineral veins are not infrequently made up in considerable part of brecciated material derived from the rubbing together and crushing of the adjacent rock. Large masses of rock thus occurring in a vein are called breccia. Friction breccia is also sometimes called fault rock. See vein and horst.

friction-card (frik' shon-kārd), n. The diagram produced by the indicator of a steam-engine when it is applied to exhibit graphically the power of an engine working without load.

friction-cones (frik' shon-konz), n. pl. In mach., a form of friction-coupling consisting of two cones, one of which is fitted into the other and communicates its motion to it by means of the friction between the two surfaces. See friction-coupling.

friction-coupling (frik' shon-kup-ling), n. In mach., a device for conveying motion from one line of shafting to another by the frictional contact of cones, expanding toggles, and clutches of various forms. In all these appliances a sleeve sliding on one of the shafts and turning with it may be advanced or drawn back at will to bring the parts into motion. In the friction-cone coupling a conical disk is pushed at will into a hollow cone, the two surfaces fitting closely together, and either, when in motion, imparting its motion to the other by friction. In other friction couplings the sliding sleeve causes a pair of toggles to expand against the inner rim of an idle pulley, and by their contact to impart to it their motion, or the movement of sliding levers over a cone causes two pulleys to be drawn together into frictional contact, or causes two disks to press one against the other. In all these couplings the object sought is to connect parts of a line of shafting by frictional contact instead of direct contact as in a gear wheel, and to obtain the same advantages by a coupling that are found in friction gearing.

Friction cones and fork.

Friction-coupling.

friction-gear (frik' shon-gēr), n. Same as friction-gearing.

friction-gearing (frik' shon-gōr' ing), n. A method or system of imparting the motion of one wheel or pulley to another by simple contact. The advantages of this kind of gearing are threefold: it enables the parts of a machine to be thrown quickly into or out of play; it gives a variable speed or power, and it prevents the injury caused by a breakage or stoppage from extending from one part of the mechanism to another or from the machine to the motor. The most simple form of friction-gearing is a pair of wheels with thin faces, which may be covered with leather, a fabric, or other elastic material, to move or less close contact. In some such wheels the faces are grooved, or the wheels are cone-shaped and placed at a right angle, and with grooves, one on the face. In others a collar on a shaft may carry pivoted arms which if turned one way press against the inner face of a wheel, and if turned the other way fall back out of contact and cease to impart their motion. In other forms one wheel revolves within another, contact being assured by means of springs. If the resistance ever opposes the springs the contact is destroyed and motion is no longer imparted. Variable speed and reversal of direction are also secured by causing a friction-wheel placed at right angles with a disk and against Friction-gearing, grooved.

it to move from the rim toward the center or past the center of the disk, as in the feed-motion of some forms of gang-saws.

frictionless (frik' shon-less), a. [< friction + -less.] Without friction.

Were water absolutely frictionless, an incline, however small, would be sufficient to produce a surface-flow from the equator to the poles.

J. Coll, Climate and Time, p. 220.

The joints and bearings of all the levers are made frictionless by using flexible steel connecting plates instead of knife-edges.

Encyc. Brit., XXII, 557.

friction-match (frik' shon-mach), n. A match tipped with a compound which ignites by friction: the usual form of match in domestic use. The first chemical matches were invented in Paris in 1805; and soon after 1827, when the composition of friction-matches was much improved by an English chemist, they came into general use, superseding the various applications of the flint and steel which had until then been relied on.

friction-plate (frik' shon-plat), n. 1. A metal plate attached to any surface to prevent abrasion or resist friction.—2. A plate used in connection with a clamp to check the recoil of a gun-carriage.

friction-powder (frik' shon-pou' dēr), n. A composition of chlorate of potash and antimony, which readily ignites by friction.

friction-primer (frik' shon-pri' mēr), n. A friction-tube. [U. S.]

friction-sound (frik' shon-sound), n. In pathol., the sound perceived on auscultation of serous surfaces which rub together when through disease they are roughened or not well lubricated.

friction-tight (frik' shon-tit), a. In mach., fitting so tightly or closely that a desired effect of friction is produced. Noting: (a) A mechanical fit, joint, or union between the surfaces of two assembled parts so close that any motion given to one part will be transmitted to the other without slipping, as a contact between two curved surfaces so perfect that their reciprocal pressure is sufficient to transmit any motion of rotation applied to one to the other without the interposition of any locking device, as a key, gib, spline, screw thread, set-screw, or polygonal surface. (b) A close fit produced by a pressure sufficient to retain a part in its position when acted upon by its weight alone.

friction-tube (frik' shon-tub), n. Milit., a tube used in firing cannon, sufficient heat being generated in it by friction to ignite friction-powder. [Eng.] Called friction-primer in the United States service.

friction-wheel (frik' shon-hwel), n. In mach.: (a) A form of slip-coupling applied in cases where the variations of load are sudden and great, as in dredging-machinery, etc. In the form illustrated a strong pulley, B, is keyed on the driving shaft, and on the circumference of this wheel A is fitted, with a series of friction-plates, a, a, a, interposed, and retained in recesses formed in the eye of the wheel. Behind each of these plates a set screw, b, is inserted, which bears against the back of the plate, and can be tightened at pleasure to regulate the degree of friction required for the ordinary work; but should the pressure on the circumference of the wheel A exceed this, the plates slide upon the circumference of the pulley B, which continues to revolve with the shaft, and the wheel itself remains stationary. (b) One of two simple wheels or cylinders intended to assist in diminishing the friction of a horizontal axis. The wheels are simply plain cylinders carried on parallel and independent axes. They are disposed so as to overlap pair and pair at each end of the main axis, which rests in the angles thus formed by the circumferences. The axis, instead of sliding on a fixed surface, as in ordinary cases, carries around the circumferences of the wheels on which it is supported with the same velocity as it possesses itself, and in consequence the friction of the system is proportionally lessened.

Friction-wheel.

A late improvement in what are called friction wheels consists of a mechanism so ordered as to be ready dropping out into a box which encloses the axis, the nave and certain balls upon which the nave revolves.

The name Frīga appears in Icel. only as the name of a goddess, the wife of Odin, different from Freya; in AS. from the same root as free, friend, frith, etc.; cf. Skt. prīyā, f., one beloved; see free, friend, frith.] The sixth day of the week. Friday is the Mohammedan sabbath or "day of assembly." It is said in the Mohammedan traditions to have been established by divine command as a day of worship for Jew and Christian alike, as being the day on which Adam was created and received into Paradise, the day on which he was expelled from it, the day on which he repented, and the day on which he died. It will, according to the same traditions, be the day of the resurrection. In the Roman and Eastern and Anglican churches, all Fridays except Christmas day (when it occurs on Friday) are generally observed as fasts of obligation or days of abstinence, in memory of the crucifixion of Christ, an event which is more especially commemorated annually on Good Friday (see below). In most Christian nations Friday is popularly regarded with superstition, and is considered an unlucky day for beginning any enterprise; to spill more or less salt on Friday is considered an especially bad omen. Until recently it was common for criminals under sentence of capital punishment to be executed on Friday; hence Friday is sometimes called hangman's day.

Black Friday. (a) Good Friday: so called because on that day, in the Western Church, the vestments of the clergy and altar are black. (b) Any Friday marked by a great calamity. With special reference in England to Friday, December 6th, 1715, the day on which news reached London that the young pretender Charles Edward had reached Derby; or to the commercial panic caused by the failure of the house of Overend and Gurney, May 11th, 1866; and in the United States to the sudden financial panic and ruin caused by reckless speculation in gold on the exchange in the city of New York on Friday, September 24th, 1869, or to another similar panic there, which began September 18th, 1873. Golden Friday. (a) The Friday in each of the ember weeks. [E. G. Lor. Eccles. Terms.] (b) Among the Nestorians, the Friday after Whit Sunday.

The Friday after Pentecost is called Golden Friday, and is a high festival. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, l. 750.

Good Friday, the Friday before Easter, a holy day of the Christian church, in memory of Christ's crucifixion, of which this day is taken as the anniversary. The early church observed it as a strict fast, in the church services doxologies were omitted, no music except the most plaintive was allowed, and the altars were stripped and draped in black. At present, in the Greek and Roman Catholic churches, Good Friday is a solemn fast, and it is also observed with special services and prayers by the Church of England, and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, and by the Lutheran German Reformed Church, Moravian, and many Methodists.

The tetter shall be Godfraye, that gode schalle revenge One the God Frydaye with galyarde knyghtes.

Morte Artoure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3432.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 1.

Alien friend, a foreigner whose country is at peace with one's own. — Friends of God, a name assumed by an unorganized brotherhood of German mystics existing in the fourteenth century, who, in opposition to the formalism and ecclesiasticalism of their age, emphasized the possibility and duty of complete self-renunciation and intimate spiritual union with God. Prominent among the leaders were Nicholas of Basel and John Tauler. As they were not bound together by either an ecclesiastical organization or a common creed, the views of religious truth differed, and some of their utterances gave rise to charges of pantheism and anthropism. — Friends of Light, Protestant Friends. See Free Congregations, under congregation. — Next friend (Law F. prochein amicus), in law: (a) In some jurisdictions, a person by whom an infant or a married woman sues, and who is responsible for costs. (b) In Soc. law, a tutor or curator. — Progressive Friends, a religious society first formed in 1853 in Pennsylvania, rationalistic in its theological tendencies, but disclaiming the binding obligation of creeds and the exercise of disciplinary authority. — Society of Friends, the proper designation of a Christian sect commonly called Quakers, which took its rise in England about the middle of the seventeenth century through the preaching of George Fox. A division occurred in portions of the society in America in 1827, through the preaching of Elias Hicks, whose followers, commonly called Hicksites, held doctrinal views closely approximating those of the Unitarians, while in church government and other respects they retain the usages of the orthodox Friends. The latter agree doctrinally with other evangelical Christians, but lay greater stress on the doctrine of the personal presence and guidance of the Holy Spirit. They have no paid ministry, and accept the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper in a spiritual sense only, rejecting their outward observance as church rites. They condemn all oath-taking and all war. The organization of the Society involves four periodical gatherings called "meetings": namely, preparative meeting, monthly meeting, quarterly meeting and yearly meeting. The body called the Yearly Meeting has supreme legislative power. There are two Yearly Meetings in Great Britain, one in Canada, and thirteen in the United States. — To be friends with, to be in a relation of mutual or reciprocal friendship with.

I am friends with all the world, but thy base malice

E.* frige, perhaps (with sonant g for sord k) < ME. frikien, keep in constant motion (of the arms and hands), < AS. frian (once), dance. Hence the assimilated form *fridge*¹, q. v.] To keep in constant motion; wriggle. [Prov. Eng.] frigate (frig'at), n. [Formerly also frigate, frigit; = D. fregat = G. fregatte = Dan. fregat = Sw. fregatt, < OF. fregate, F. fregate, < It. fregata, dial. fragata = Sp. Pg. fragata, a frigate; perhaps, as Diez supposes, for fargata*, an assumed contr. form of L. fabricata, fem. pp. of fabricare, build, construct, whence fabricate: cf. E. *forge*¹ (F. forja, Sp. Pg. forja, etc.), from the same source. So F. bâtiment, a building, also a vessel.] 1. Any small sailing vessel.

Behold the water works and play
About her little frigate, therein making way.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 7.

Under those vertie bridges he left certain spaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigates might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themselves thither again in safety.
Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 745.

We took a frigate of tenne tunne, coming from Gwa-thanelo laden with hides and ginger.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 289.

2. Among ships of war of the old style, a vessel larger than a sloop or a brig, and smaller than a ship of the line, usually carrying her guns (which varied in number from about thirty to fifty or sixty) on the main-deck and on a raised quarter-deck and fore-castle, or having two decks. Such ships were often fast sailers, and were much used as cruisers in the great wars of the eighteenth and the early part of the nineteenth century. Since the introduction of iron-clad vessels the term frigate has been applied to war ships of this kind having high speed and great fighting power.

He [Commissioner Pett] . . . invented that excellent and new ornament of the navy which we call frigates, formidable to our enemies, to us most useful and safe.
Evelyn, Memoirs, I. 671.

On the third day of May the admiral (Russell) sailed from St. Helena with the combined squadrons of England and Holland, amounting to twenty ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, and tenders.
Smollett, Hist. Eng., an. 1693.

3. Same as frigate-bird. Double-banked frigate, or double banker, a frigate which carried guns on two decks, and had a flush upper deck.

frigate-bird (frig'at-bérd), n. A large marine bird, the Fregata aquila or Tachypetris aquilus and other species of the same genus, belonging to the family Fregatidae or Tachypetridae and order Steganopodes or Totipalmata, noted for powers of flight and raptorial disposition, found near land on most of the warmer seas of the globe. It has long pointed wings with a great sweep, a long, forked tail, extremely small totipalmate feet, a long, strong, hooked bill, a gular pouch, and dark coloration. Also called frigate, frigate-petrel, and man-of-war bird.

frigate-bull (frig'at-bilt), n. Naut., having a quarter-deck and fore-castle raised above the main-deck.

frigate-mackerel (frig'at-mak'e-rel), n. A scombroid fish, Scomber thazard, of stout fusiform shape, with the spinous dorsal fin remote from the second one, and having a toothless vomer

And indeed, it is much better to be such a henpecked frigot (sic errata) than always to be racked and tortured with the grating surmises of suspicion and jealousy.

Renet, tr. of Erasmus a Fraile of Folly, p. 28.

frijole (Sp. pron. frê-hô'la), n. [Sp. frijol, frâ-jol, also frijol, frijuelo = Cat. fajol, French bean, kidney-bean, < L. fasciatus, phaseolus, kidney bean: see fasciatus and phaseolus.] The common name in Mexico for the cultivated bean of that country, which forms an important staple of food.

The Mexicans were also skilful makers of earthen pots, in which were cooked the native beans called by the Spanish frijoles, and the various savory stews still in vogue.

E. B. Tylor, Enycy. Brit., XVI, 213.

frijolillo (Sp. pron. frê-hô-lô'lyô), n. [Mex. Sp., dim. of Sp. frijol: see frijole.] The Lonchocarpus latifolius, a leguminous tree of Mexico and the West Indies.

friker, a. See freckle.

frillalt, n. [Cf. frill.] A border of ornamental ribbon, mentioned as in use in 1690. Fairholt.

frill (fril), v. i. [Cf. OF. friller, shiver with cold, < frilleux, chill, cold of nature, F. frileux, chill, < ML. frigidulus, < L. frigidulus, somewhat cold, dim. of frigidus, cold: see frigid.] To shiver with cold, as a hawk or other bird.

frill (fril), n. [Cf. frill, v.] A shivering with cold, as a bird; the ruffling of a bird's feathers when shivering with cold.

frill (fril), n. [A particular use of frill, n., a border of this kind being likened to the ruffling of a bird's feathers when it shivers with cold: see frill, n.] 1. A narrow ornamental bordering made of a strip of textile material, of which one edge is gathered and the other left loose, as in a narrow flounce; a ruffle.

His frill and neckcloth hung limp under his bagging waistcoat. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, I, 284.

Did he stand at the diamond door
Of his house in a rainbow frill?

Tennyson, Maud, xxiv.

Hence — 2. Anything resembling such a border.

How delicate thy gauzy frill!

How rich thy branching at an!

E. Elliott, To the Bramble Flower.

Specifically (a) The projecting fringe of hair on the chest of some dogs, as the collie.

The Pomeranian dog is employed as a sheep dog, for which he is fitted by his peculiarly woolly coat and ample frill, rendering him to a great degree proof against wet and cold. Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 132.

(b) Some fringing part or process of an animal, like a ruffle; as, the genital frills of a hydrotan. Encycy. Brit., XII, 363. (c) In hymenopterous fungi, a superior annulus or ring; an annulus formed of tissue suspended from the apex of the stipe and free at other points, at first forming a membranous covering for the apothecium, but detached as the plicae expand; an ar. ML. frill, (d) In photog., the swelling and loosening of a gelatin film around the edges of a plate. See frill, v.

3. An affectation of dress or of manner; an air; usually in the plural: as, he puts on too many frills. [Colloq., U. S.] Frill pattern, n. in seam. A pattern made of separate small threads of slip laid side by side on the surface. See slip decoration.

frill (fril), v. [Cf. frill, n.] I. trans. 1. To form into a frill; flute or plait: as, to frill a border in a dress.

His long mustaches on his upper lip, like bristles, frilled back to his neck. Knutler, Hist. Turke, p. 310.

2. To ornament with frills: as, to frill a child's garment. Frilled lizard. Same as frilled lizard.

II. intrans. To become frilled or ruffled. Specifically, in photography, said of the gelatin film of a dry plate when in course of the development, from too high temperature of the water or other cause, it rises from the glass in ruffles, which may be sufficiently extended to destroy the picture, or even to cause the entire film to slip from the plate.

frillback (fril'bak), n. One of a particular breed of domestic pigeons.

frilling (fril'ing), n. [Verbal n. of frill, v.] 1. Frills; ruffles; gathered strips in general. — 2. In photog., a ruffling up or loosening of the film of a gelatin-emulsion plate. It appears during the development or fixing of the negative, and may be guarded against by the use of alum in the fixing-bath, or of ice in the water used for washing.

frill-lizard (fril'liz'ard), n. The Anglo-Australian name of a lizard of the genus Chlamydosaurus (which see). C. kingi has a crocodile membrane like that of its neck, which it elevates when irritated or frightened. It is said sometimes to walk on its hind legs alone, a very unusual mode of progression among existing reptiles. Also called frilled lizard. See cut in next column.

frim (frim), a. [Cf. ME. frum, < AS. fræme, a secondary form of fram, from, bold, forward, strenuous, strong, etc.: see from, adv., and cf. frame, v.] Flourishing. [Prov. Eng.]

Frill-lizard (Chlamydosaurus kingi).

My plenteous bosom strow'd
With all abundant sweets, my froe and lusty flank
Her bravery then displays, with meadows hugely rank Drayton, Polyolbion, xlii, 397.

Frime (frê-mâr'), n. [F. < frimas, hoar frost, rime, < OF. frimer, freeze: referred, doubtfully, to feel, hrim = AS. hrim, rime: see rime.] The third month of the French revolutionary calendar (see calendar), beginning, in the year 1793, on November 21st, and ending December 20th.

frindt, n. An obsolete form of friend.

frine (frin), v. i.; pret. and pp. frined, ppr. frining. [Cf. Sw. dial. frina = Norw. fröyna, make a wry face; cf. Sw. dial. frina = Odan. frine, make a wry face. See frown, v.] To whine or whimper; fret. [North. Eng. and Scotch.] fringe (frinj), n. [Cf. ME. frange, frenge, < OF. fringe* (not found, but inferred from F. dial. frinche, lt. dial. frinza, ML. fringia), another form of OF. frange, F. frange = It. frangia = Sp. Pg. franja (cf. D. frange, frange = MLG. frēne = MLG. franze, G. franse = Sw. frans = Dan. fryndse, a fringe, < F.; appar. the same, with unexplained deviation of form, as Pr. frenna = Wallachian frimbe, < LL. fimbria, a border, fringe, L. pl. fimbria, fibers, threads, shreds, fibrous part, fringe: see fimbria.] 1. An ornamental bordering formed of short lengths of thread, whether loose or twisted, or of twisted cord more or less fine, variously arranged or combined, projecting from the edge of the material ornamented. Fringe may consist of the frayed or raveled edge of the piece of stuff ornamented, but it is generally of other material, often made very solid and ponderous, the cords being of tightly twisted silk or of gold or silver thread of considerable thickness and length.

Assyrian Fringes from ancient bas reliefs.

She shaw'd me a mantle of red scarlet,
With golden flowers on a fringed rim.

Alison Greig's Child's Ballads, I, 168.

Oh! Where dwell you, pretty youth?
Ros! With this shepherdess, my sister, here, in the skirts of the forest, like fringe upon a petticoat.

Shink, As You Like It, III, 2.

The objection was not to the dress-tanning which has been known as frime for above five hundred years, but to a mode of dressing the hair which concealed the forehead, by the front hair being cut short and falling over it after the fashion of frim. N. and Q., 7th ser., III, 285.

2. Something resembling a fringe; a broken border; any border or edging: as, a fringe of trees around a field, or of shrubs around a garden; a fringe of troops along a line of defense.

And as she sleeps
See how light creeps
Through the chinque and beauties
The rayed fringe of her faire eyes.

Cotton, Song.

That charity which bears the dying and lanchishing soul from the fringes of hell to the seat of the brightest stars. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 732.

The great mainland is barbarian: the islands and a few of sea coast are Greek.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 334.

Specifically — 3. In bot., a border of slender processes or teeth; a fimbria. — 4. In optics, one of the alternate light and dark bands produced by diffraction. See diffraction. — 5. In zool., a row of closely set, even hairs on a margin; specifically, in entom., the edging of fine even hairs on the wing of a butterfly or moth.

In some of the lower moths, as the Pieris, the fringe of the secondary is frequently wider than the wing itself. 6. In photog., a thickened edge of inferior sensitiveness on the pouring-off margin of a sensitized plate. — Marginal fringes, in ornith., the membranous borders or fringe-like processes along the toes of sundry birds.

fringe (frinj), v. t.; pret. and pp. fringed, ppr. fringing. [Cf. fringe, n.] To decorate with a fringe or fringes, whether by raveling the edge, as of cloth, or by sewing on; border.

They have pretty peeces of pretty coloured cloth . . . hanging from the middle of their forehead down to their noses, fringed with long faire fringe.

Corvat, Crudities, I, 69.

The tumbling billows fringe with light
The crescent shore of Lyonn.

O. W. Holmes, Agnes.

Dear common flower, that grow'st beside the way,
Fringing the dusty road with harmless gold.

Lowell, To the Dandelion.

Fringed bog-bean. See bog-bean. — Fringed gentian. See gentian. — Fringing reef. See reef.

fringe-backed (frinj'bak), a. Having the back fringed, as a lizard.

fringeless (frinj'les), a. [Cf. fringe + -less.] Having no fringe.

fringelet (frinj'let), n. [Cf. fringe + -let.] A small fringe.

Each fringelet is a tube made of firm elastic membrane. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI, 747.

fringent (frinj'ent), a. [Cf. fringe + -ent.] Fringing; encircling like a fringe.

A shower of meteors
Cross the orbit of the earth,
And lit by fringent air,
Blaze near and far.

Emerson, Dæmonie and Celestial Love.

fringepod (frinj'pod), n. A name given in California to Thysanocarpus laciniatus, a cruciferous plant with flattened, orbicular, winged pods, the margin of which is frequently lobed or fringed.

fringe-tree (frinj'tré), n. The Chionanthus Virginica, a small tree allied to the ash, found on river-banks in the United States, from Pennsylvania to Texas, and frequently planted for ornament. It bears loose drooping panicles of white flowers, the long narrow petals of which suggest the name. It is sometimes used in medicine, especially in jaundice and fevers. — Purple fringe-tree, the smoke-tree, Rhus Cotinus.

Fringilla (frin-jil'la), n. [NL., < L. fringilla, also fringilla and fringilla, some small bird, supposed to be the chaffinch; origin unknown; possibly, like finch, q. v., ult. imitative of the bird's note.] A Linnean genus of birds, the finches, once nearly continuous with the modern family Fringillidae, and of no determinate limits: now usually restricted to such species as the chaffinch or common finch of Europe, F. caelebs, and considered typical of the family Fringillidae. See cut under chaffinch.

fringillaceous (frin-jil'la'shius), a. [Cf. Fringilla + -aceous.] Pertaining to the finches or Fringillidae; fringilliform; fringilline.

Fringillidae (frin-jil'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Fringilla + -idae.] A large and nearly cosmopolitan family of small seed-eating conirostral laminiplumbeous passerine birds with nine primaries; the finches. It is not susceptible of exact definition, and is of fluctuating limits. The group has been made to include the larks (Alaudidae), which are scutellipalmar; the weaver-birds (Ploceidae), which are 10-primered; and to exclude the buntings (Emberizidae), which cannot be distinguished from the finches. The tanager (Tanagra) have been both included and excluded. According to the present composition of the group, the buntings are included, the other birds above mentioned being excluded; and the Fringillidae contain all the finches, buntings, grosbeaks, crossbills, sparrows, linnets, siskins, etc., which conform to the characters above given. There are some 500 nominal species, distributed in upward of 100 so-called genera. No tenable subdivision of the family exists, though several have been proposed. The latest authority makes 3 subfamilies: Coccothraustinae, Fringillinae, and Emberizinae, or the grosbeaks, finches proper, and buntings.

fringilliform (frin-jil'i-fôr'm), a. [Cf. NL. fringilliformis, < Fringilla + L. forma, form.] Finch-like; fringilline or fringillaceous.

Fringilliformes (frin-jil'i-fôr'més), n. pl. [NL.: see fringilliform.] In Sundevall's system of classification, a group of birds, the same as his Conirostres.

Fringillinae (frin-jil'i-né), n. pl. [NL., < Fringilla + -inae.] A conventional subfamily of Fringillidae, having no definition, taking name from and including the genus Fringilla; the true finches. The most typical representatives of the subfamily have the nasal bones not produced beyond the line of the orbits, the mandibular angle slight, and the cutting edges of the bill apposed throughout or nearly so. See cut under chaffinch.

fringilline (frin-jil'in), a. [< Fringilla + -ine.] Fish-like; fringillaceous or fringilliform; in a restricted sense, of or pertaining to the fringillinae. Coues.

fringy (frin'ji), a. [< fringe + -y.] Of the nature of a fringe; adorned with fringes.

Lord of my time, my devious path I bend
Through fringy woodland, or smooth-shaven lawn.
Shenstone, Elegies, xiv.

frislert (frisp'ler), n. Same as frisper. Nares.

Though they smell of the frislert's lavender half a year after.
Greene, Arcadia.

fripper (frisp'er), n. [Also written fripper (and lengthened fripperer); < OF. fripier, one who mends or trims up old garments and sells them, < fripper, rub up and down, wear out rags, F. friper, rumple, crumple, wear out (clothes), spoil.] One who deals in frippery or old clothes.

Farewell, fripper, farewell, petty broker.
Chapman, Monsieur D'Olive.

A fripper's or broker's shop, that hath ends of every thing, but nothing of worth.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 247.

fripperer (frisp'er-er), n. Same as fripper.

frippery (frisp'er-i), n. and a. [< OF. friperie, F. friperie, an old-clothes shop, fripper's trade, old clothes, frippery, < fripper, fripper: see fripper.] I. n. 1. Trade or traffic in old clothes.

D'O. Now your profession, I pray?
Fr. Frippery, my lord, or, as some term it, Petty Brokery.
Chapman, Monsieur D'Olive, III. 1

2. A place where old clothes are sold.

Trin. Look, what a wardrobe here is for thee!
Cal. Let it alone, thou fool; it is but trash.
Trin. O, ho, monster, we know what belongs to a frip-pery.
Shak., Tempest, IV. 1.

He shows like a walking frippery.
Musgrave, City Madam, I. 1

3. Old clothes; cast-off garments; clothing discarded after wearing.

A world of desperate undertakings, possibly,
Procures some hungry meals, some tavern suppers,
Some frippery to hide nakedness.
Fort, Fancies, I. 1

Rag fair is a place near the Tower of London where old clothes and frippery are sold. Pope, Dunciad, I. 23, note.

It is a saturnal of complacent big-knurdism and vulgar villany, tricked out in the cast-off frippery of Thaddeus of Warsaw and Sir Charles Grandison.
Wagner, Las and Rev., II. 106

Hence — 4. Worthless or useless trifles; trumpery; gewgaws.

Poor poet ape, that would be thought our chief,
Whose works are even the frippery of wit. R. Jonson
By living a year or two in town, she is as fond of gauze and French frippery as the best of them.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, I. 1

The gauzy frippery of a French translation. Scott
There seems (in Ravana) to be no interval between the marbles and mosaics of Justinian or Theodoric and the insignificant frippery of the last century.
J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 263.

II. a. Trifling; frivolous; contemptible; trumpy.

With his flye popping in and out again,
Argued a cause a frippery cause.
Pletcher, The Chances, II. 2

That city, though the capital of a duchy, made so frip-pery an appearance, that instead of spending some days there, as had been intended, we only dined, and went on to Parma. Gray, To his Mother

The King gave her a gold watch and chain the next day.
She says, "the manner was all" — and indeed so it was,
for I never saw a more frippery present.
Walsley, Letters, II. 191.

frizadot, frizadot (fri-zä'dōt), n. [Also friezadow and friezadown; < Sp. frizado, silk plush or shag; see frieze, frizz.] A fine kind of frieze.

In winter your vpper garment must be of cotton or friezadot. Roberts Book (E. T. S.), p. 249.

A patent was granted (in 1547) to Charles Hastings, Esq., that in consideration that he brought in the skill of making friezadons as they were made at Harlem and Amsterdam, being not used in England, that therefore he should have the sole trade thereof for divers years, etc.
A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 23

frise¹, n. An obsolete form of *frieze*¹.

frise², n. An obsolete form of *frieze*².

frise³ (fréz), n. Same as chereau-de-frise.

frisesomorum (fris'e-sō-mō-rum), n. The mnemonic name of an indirect mood of the first figure of syllogism. The following is an example:
Some prophecies come true; but no scientific prediction is prophecy; hence, some things that come true are not scientific predictions. Three of the vowels and four of the consonants of this name, which is one of those given by Petrus Hispanus (see barbara), are significant. I indicates that the major premise is a particular affirmative; a, that the minor premise is a universal negative; e, that the conclusion is a particular negative; f, that the mood is to be reduced to ferio; the two *s*s, that the premises are both to be simply converted in the reduction; and the first m, that the premises are to be transposed. Primo- morum is one of the moods not given by Aristotle, but added by his pupil Theophrastus, and it is the most interesting of these. It is sometimes called frisesomum, and, by English writers who place it in the fourth figure, frisesomum.

See mood².

frisette (fri-zet'ē), n. [Dim. of F. frise, frieze.]
A finer variety of frieze.

frisette, n. See frisette.

friseur (frē-zēr'), n. [< F. friser, curl, frizz;
see frizz.] A hair-dresser.

That barbers' boys who would to trade advance Wish us to call them smart friseurs from France.
Crabbe.

His (Hogg's) very hair has a coarse stringiness about it which proves beyond dispute its utter ignorance of all the arts of the friseur.
Lockhart, in Personal Traits of Brit. Authors.

Frisian, a. and n. See Friesian.

Frisket, a. and n. See Frisket.

sense): see fresh.] I. a. Lively; brisk;
frisky.

II. n. A frolic; a gambol; a dance; a merry-making.

Then does the salvage beasts begin to play
Their pleasant frisks, and both their wonted food.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 40.

Is not this fine, I trow, to see the gambols,
To hear the jigs, observe the frisks, be enchanted
With the rare discord of bells, pipes, and tabors, Hot h patch of Scotch and Irish twinkle twangles.
Ford, Broken Wreath, III. 2.

The joyful surprise that lighted up their faces and displayed itself over their whole bodies, in a variety of persons and frisks. Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 242.

frisk (frisk), v. [= Sw. friska (app), refresh, freshen, exhilarate, = ODan. friske, freshen, Dan. friske app, refresh, revive; from the adj.]

I. intrans. 1. To leap, skip, prance, or gambol, as in frolic.

One frisks and sings, and cries, A dragon more
To drench dry carps. Queller, Emblems, I. 8.

Nor frisking hinders bound about the place,
To spurn the dew drops off.
Addison, Tr. of Virgil's Georgics, IV.

The truant turned a deaf ear, and kept tramping on the top of the rising ground like a golden-yellow moonlight.
At. Kendworth, IX.

2. To freshen, as the wind.

II. trans. To squander idly; dissipate in sport; with away.

If not advised, thou art drawn in beyond a retreat, or at least to frisk away much of thy time and estate.
A. Cap. de. (quoted in Nares) friskalt (fris'kal), n. Same as friskle.

frisker (fris'kōr), n. One who frisks or gambols, an incontinent or frivolous person.

Now I am a frisker, all men on me take
What I should do but act cock on the loose.
Dr. Baard, in Camden's Remains, Inhabitants frisket (fris'ket), n. [< F. frisque; see frisk.]

In printing, a thin framework of iron linged to the top of the tympan of a hand-press. For use, a sheet of paper is stretched and pushed over the frisket, and from this paper spaces are cut out to permit contact between the type and the sheet to be printed, which it serves to hold in place when the frisket is folded down upon the tympan, and to keep clean in the parts not printed.

friskful (fris'fōl), a. [< frisk + ful.] Brisk;
lively; frolicsome.

1. The material of which glass is made as prepared for complete fusion by a previous calcination carried to a point where the silica begins to act on the bases, forming an imperfectly melted or fritted mass. 2. The composition from which artificial soft or tender porcelain and other partly vitrifiable mixtures are made.
See soft porcelain, under porcelain.

This French pale tondre or artificial porcelain, as it is sometimes called, is composed of alkaline frittes and carbonate of lime, covered with a lead glaze analogous in nature to flint glass. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 667.

Frit body, in ceram, a body the materials of which are first mixed, then fired, and lastly ground up with clay.
The result is a vitrified appearance throughout. - Frit porcelain, a name given to the artificial soft paste English porcelain, from its vitreous nature, the paste prepared for it being a frit not unlike that of the glass-makers. This name was given to it by the first makers of hard paste or true porcelain in England. See faux porcelain, under porcelain.

frithborg (frith'borg), n. [AS. frith-borch*, frith-borg*, found only as used or quoted in the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor (in Latin), namely, frithborg, frith borch, acc. pl. frithborgas, and Latinized (nom.) frithborgus, where the editions of Lambard and Wilkins give (acc. pl.) freoborges, Latinized (nom.) friborgus; hence the form friborg in Fleta, and friborg, friburgh, fricborg in later writers. The proper AS. form is frithborg*, < frith, peace, + borg, a pledge (> E. borrow, n.). Cf. frithsoken and frith-pledge.] In Anglo-Saxon law, one of the tithings or groups of ten men into which the hundred was divided, the members of each one being held liable for the misdeeds of a fellow-member.

As touching the King's peace, every hundred was divided into many friths or tithings consisting of ten men, which stood all bound one for the other, and did amongst themselves punish small matters in their court for that purpose called the tithing.

Spelman, Anc. Government of England.

But the name of tithing has been very commonly applied both by historical writers and in legal custom to denote the association of ten men in common responsibility legally embodied in the frithborg or frith-pledge.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., 43.

frithgild (frith'gild), n. [AS. frithgild, < frith, peace, + gild, a guild.] In Anglo-Saxon law, a union of neighbors pledged to one another by oath for the preservation of order and for self-defense, all being liable for the misdeeds of any member of the guild. On the decline of the kinfolk organization in the tenth century, this became a common element in social order in England.

Strong as the crown might be, its strength lay in the king's personal action, and it was far from possessing any adequate police or judicial machinery for carrying its will into effect. To supply such a machinery was the aim of the frith-gilda.

J. R. Green, Comp. of Eng., p. 219.

frithsoken (frith'so'ken), n. [Also frithsoken, frithsoken, frithsoca; ME. frithsoken, "franchise de franc plege" (Rel. Antiq., I, 33), < AS. frithsoken, lit. a peace-seeking, < frith, peace, + soca, a refuge, searching, a seeking; see frith and soca, n., savage.] 1. In Anglo-Saxon law, the franchise or governmental power of requiring the people to keep the peace; the jurisdiction to punish for breaches of the peace. This power was profitable by reason of the fines and forfeitures resulting from its exercise; consequently it was often conferred in the charters and royal grants of early English history, beginning in the later part of the Anglo-Saxon period, about the time of Edward the Confessor (see see). The Normans, it is supposed, by confusing the Anglo-Saxon frith with fre, free, modern free, adopted the term frithsoken to designate the binding of persons to be peculiarly responsible for one another's peaceable conduct.

Hence, in later times—2. The liberty of having a view of frank-pledge. See frank-pledge.

frithsplot (frith'splot), n. [AS. occurring only once, < frith, peace, + splot, a spot (not the same as spot).] A plot of land encircling some stone, tree, or well, considered sacred, and therefore affording sanctuary to criminals.

Wharton.

frithstool (frith'stol), n. [A mod. form, corruptly fredestole, fredestool, repr. AS. frith-stol, an asylum, sanctuary, lit. stool of peace or protection, < frith, peace, protection, + stol, a seat, chair, stool.] In Anglo-Saxon times, a seat or chair in a church, near the altar, to which persons fled who sought the privilege of sanctuary.

Athelstan his son succeeded King Edward, being much devoted to St. John of Beverley, on whose church he bestowed a freed-stool with large privileges belonging thereto.

Fulter, Church Hist., II, v. 3.

Such a privilege (the right of sanctuary or refuge for criminals) was given by allowing what was called the frithstool to be set up in some part of the hallowed building. This "stool of peace," for such is the meaning of the word, was a low backed arm chair, made of stone. Its standing place was either near the high altar, or by the side of the patron saint's shrine. From this spot, as from a center, the frithstool spread its privilege of sanctuary over land and water all about the minister which held it, to the distance of at least a mile.

Rack, Church of our Fathers, III, 1, 365.

frithy (frith'i), a. [(< frith), 2. + -y.] Woody.

Thus stode I in the frithy forest of Galtres.

Froebelian (fré-bel'i-an), a. and n. [<Froebel (see def.) + -ian.] I. a. Of, pertaining to, or originated by Friedrich Froebel (1782-1852), a German philosopher and educational reformer, and the founder of the kindergarten system; as, the Froebelian method of instruction. See kindergarten.

II. n. An advocate or follower of the kindergarten system.

The uncle and nephew differed so widely that the "new Froebeliens" were to the old ones of "the old."

Encyc. Brit., IX 704

Froebelism (fré-bel-izm), n. [<Froebel (see def.) + -ism.] The system or method of instruction, usually called the kindergarten system, originated by Froebel. See kindergarten.

The great propagandist of Froebelism, the Baroness von Marenholtz-Bowlow, drew the attention of the French to the kindergarten from the year 1850. Encyc. Brit., XIV, 80.

frog¹ (frog), n. [<ME. frogge, <AS. frogga ("frog" not authenticated, "frogga" erroneous), a frog, akin to AS. frox (for "froge"), ME. frok, frosch, frosch, etc. (cf. var. frock², <ME. froke), = D. Mlat. vrosch = OHG. vrosch, MHG. vrosch, G. vrosch = Leol. vrosch, a frog; cf. Dan. frø, a frog; Leol. frankr, a frog; the origin is unknown.] A batrachian of the family Ranidae (which see), as the common British Rana temporaria, or its North American representative, R. sylvatica. Of the true frogs there are about 250 species, belonging to 18 genera, common in most parts of the world except the Neotropical and Austrogean regions, including for the most part aquatic or arboreal batrachians, distinguished by their agility and symmetry, as well as by their webbed toes, from the related toad-like animals which are popularly named toads, but the distinction is not always preserved. Of the genus Rana alone there are upward of 110 species, most of which are aquatic, are expert swimmers, and capable of making very long leaps; some are terrestrial, and some arboreal. Several different kinds of frogs are edible, as the common European R. esculenta. The largest species is the bullfrog of the United States, R. catesbeiana. (See bullfrog, and also under Amura and Rana.) *Others of the same country are R. palustris, R. fulvipes, and R. adusta. The toes of some arboreal frogs are enormously lengthened and fully webbed, enabling the creature to make long flying leaps. (See flying frog, Rhacophorus.) Some have the ends of the toes dilated, like many of the toads. The tongue of most true frogs is emarginate behind, with a process on each side. Most frogs deposit their spawn in masses in the water, and the young hatch from the egg as tadpoles, provided with a tail and external gills, which disappear with the growth of the permanent limbs. The arboreal batrachians known indifferently as tree-frogs or tree-toads are not frogs in any proper sense, but belong to a different suborder (Archeopoda) of salient amphibians. (See Hydrol.) The name frog is loosely applied, with or without a qualifying term, to some other batrachians equally remote from the Ranidae, and locally in the United States to certain lizards. See phrases below.

Poor Tom; that eats the swimming frog, the toad, the tadpole. Shak., Learn, III 1

I did eat fried Fropper in this cille, which is a dish much used in many cities of Italy.

Coryat, Cruetles, I. 138.

Yet gnats have had, and frogs and mice, long since,
Their eulogy; those sang the Mantuan bard,
And these the Grecian, in emboling strains.

froggy¹ (frog'i), a. [<frog¹ + -y.] 1. Having or abounding in frogs. —2. Frog-like; froggish.

froggy² (frog'i), a.; pl. froggyes (-iz). [<frog¹ + -y.] A diminutive of frog¹: often applied, as slang, familiarly to Frenchmen, from their reputed habit of eating frogs.

froghood (frog'hud), n. [<frog¹ + -hood.] Quality or standing as a frog. [Humorous.]

The mouse, adverse to be overpowered
Gave him the lie, and call'd him coward;
Too hard for any frog a digestion,
To have his froghood called in question!

C. Smart, The Duellist.

frog-hopper (frog'hop'er), n. A homopterous insect of the family Cercopidae, so called from the general shape of the body and the power of leaping. A common frog-hopper is the Aphrophora spumaria, whose larvae are found on leaves, enclosed in a frothy liquid, commonly called cuckoo-spit, cuckoo-spittle, frog-spit, or frog-spittle. Also called frog-fly, frog-cloak, frog-fly, frog-insect, frog-worm.

frogling (frog'ling), n. [<frog¹ + -ling.] A little frog.

He does not fall the gnats of the air . . . nor the froglings of the water. Jarvis, Tr. of Don Quixote, I. III 4.

frogmouth (frog'-mouth), n. Any bird of the family Podargidae, especially of the genus Batrachostomus.

frog-mouthed (frog'moutht), a. Having a large wide mouth, like a frog's. Specifically applied in ornithology to the great goat-necked of the genus Batrachostomus, translating the adjective batrachostomus derived from the generic name.

frog-plate (frog'plat), n. An accessory to the compound microscope by which the web of a frog's foot can be exposed on the stage in order to show the circulation of the blood.

Fronde (frond), n. [F., lit. a sling; with irreg. inserted r, < OF. fonde = Pr. fonda, funda = Sp. funda = Pg. funda = It. funda, < L. funda, a sling; cf. Gr. ἀσπιδίον, a sling.] In French hist., the name of a party which during the minority of Louis XIV. waged civil war against the court party, on account of the humiliations inflicted on the high nobility and the heavy fiscal impositions laid on the people. The movement began with the resistance of the Parliament of Paris to the measures of the minister Mazarin, and was sarcastically called by one of his supporters there "the war of the fronde," in allusion to the use of the sling then common among the street boys of Paris. The contest continued from 1648 to 1652, during which Mazarin was driven from power, but soon restored. The opposition to him had degenerated into a course of selfish intrigue and party strife, whence the name frondeur became a term of political reproach.

fronded (fron'ded), a. [< frond + -ed.] Having fronds.

I know not where Histiola liff
Their fronded palms lie hid.
Whittier, The Eternal Goodness.

frondent (fron'dent), a. [= Pg. frondente, < L. frondent(-s), ppr. of frondere, have or put forth leaves, be leafy, < frons (frond-), a leafy branch: see frond.] Leafy.

frons (fronz), n.; pl. frons (fron'téz). [L., the forehead, brow, front: see front.] The forehead. Technically: (a) In mammal, that part of the skull which lies between the orbits of the eyes and the forehead of the vertex. (b) In orath, that part of the head which slopes upward from the bill to the vertex. (c) In conch, that part of a univalve shell presenting when the aperture is toward the observer. (d) In entom., generally, the anterior part of the epinotum, or upper part of the head, immediately back of the epistoma or clypeus when this is present. The term is somewhat loosely used, and varies in its application with different orders. In Hymenoptera, Lepidoptera, and Neuroptera the frons lies in front of the antennae and partly between the eyes; but in Coleoptera and Hemiptera the antennae are often inserted at the sides of the frons, which is then divided by a more or less imaginary line from the vertex or crown. In the Diptera the frons is the part above the antennae, the part below them being called the face. — Frons alta, a high forehead: a phrase used to signify that the forehead is more than one third of the total length of the face. — Frons brevis, a low forehead: a phrase used to signify that the forehead is less than one third of the total length of the face. — Frons proportionata, a proportionate forehead: a phrase signifying that the forehead is one third of the total length of the face.

Kiss'd the white star upon his noble front.
Tennyson, Geraint.

2. The forehead or face as expressive of character, temper, or disposition; characteristic facial appearance.

Norton, from Daniel and Octavia sprung,
Bleed with his father's front and mother's tongue,
Hung silent down his never blushing head.
Pope, Dunciad, II, 416.

I placed thee as a guard to the rich blossoms of my daughter's beauty. I thought that dragon's front of thine would cry aloof to the sons of gallantry—steel traps and spring guns seemed wilt in every wrinkle of it.
Sheridan, The Duenna, I, 3.

Hence—3. Manner of facing or opposing; attitude or bearing when confronted with anything, as in meeting a foe, a threatened danger, or an accuser; as, to put on a bold front; to await the enemy with a calm front. Sometimes used in the sense of cool assurance or impudence.

Do what I enjoin you. No disputing
Of my prerogative with a front or frown.
B. Jonson, New Inn, II, 2.

A movable cover or hanging for the front of an altar. Frontals are of silk, satin, damask, or other material, and are made of different colors for the different festivals and seasons of the church year. Sometimes they cover not only the front but the ends of the altar. This was usual in the middle ages. Over the upper part of the frontal falls another shorter hanging, also reaching the whole width of the altar, and along the ends. This is now commonly called the superfrontal (formerly the frontlet or frontel), and is attached to one of the three linen cloths on the mensa or to the frontal, concealing the edge of the altar.
Also called front, and by the Latin names antependium, palla, and pallium.

An altar cloth, with a frontlet, for the great feast days.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 233.

(b) In England, in the middle ages, also a moveable cover of wood or precious metal for the front of the altar. Such a frontal was sometimes called a table (also tabula, tablamentum).

At the more solemn festivals, the high altar in the richer churches, was sheathed in a cloth of silver frontal studied with precious stones, with a lace of costly ones. It was gracefully shrouded in folds of a costly

Frugivora (frŭ-jiv'ŏ-rŭ), n. pl. [NL., < L. frux (frug), fruits, & vorare, devour.] A division of the order Chiroptera, including the fruit-eating bats of the warmer parts of the old world, such as the so-called "flying-foxes." The head resembles that of a dog in shape, there is no peculiar formation of the ears of nose; the pyloric division of the stomach is enormously lengthened; and there are dental characters corresponding to the frugivorous regimen of the species. There is in nearly all the species a claw upon the second digit of the hand, never present in the insectivorous bats. See also under frug for fruit bat, and Pteropus. The Frugivora are also called Megachiroptera. The term is contrasted with Insectivora or Animalivora.

frugivorous (frŭ-jiv'ŏ-rus) a. [= F. frugivore = Pg. It. frugivoro, < L. frux (frug), fruits, & vorare, devour.] 1. Feeding on fruits, especially soft fruits, as many mammals, birds, etc., those which feed on small hard fruits, as seeds and grain, being distinguished usually as granivorous.

The anatomy of the human stomach . . . and the formation of the teeth clearly place man in the class of frugivorous animals.
Preston, Headlong Hall, II.

2. Specifically, in mammal, pertaining to the Frugivora.

fruit (frŭt), n. [< ME. fruit, frute, frut, sometimes fruit, trogt, frut, < OF. fruit, F. fruit = Pr. fruit, frug = Sp. fruta = It. frutto = OS. frucht = OFries. frucht = D. vrucht (and fruit, < F.) = M.G. vrucht = OHG. frucht, MHG. erucht, G. frucht = Icel. frukt = Sw. frukt = Dan. frugt, < L. fructus (fructu), an enjoying, enjoyment, usually in concrete sense, proceeds, product, produce, fruit, income, etc., < fru (orig. frugri*) (cf. frux (frug), fruit), pp. fructus (fructu), also fructus, enjoy, use, = AS. brucan, use, E. brook, endure: see brook.] Hence also, from L. fruit, E. fructify, fructuous, frugal, frument, frumenty, etc.] 1. In a general sense, any product of vegetable growth useful to men or animals, as grapes, figs, corn, cotton, flax, and all cultivated plants. [In this comprehensive sense the word is generally used in the plural.]

Fruit and corn ther faylede. . . .
Six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof.
Ex. xxiii. 10.

That it may please thee to give and preserve to our use the kindly [natural] fruits of the earth so that in due time we may enjoy them.
Book of Common Prayer, Litany.

2. In a more limited sense, the reproductive product of a tree or other plant; the seed of plants, or the part that contains the seeds, as wheat, rye, oats, apples, pears, nuts, etc.

Who shall be the first he fore Christe that has nought the floure? . . .
Hamper, Flowe Treatises (F. L. T. S.), p. 4.

Fruit of all kinds. In coat Rough or smooth rind, or bearded husk, or shell.
She gathers tribute large, and on the board
Reas with unsparing hand.
Milton, P. L., v. 341.

Wearing his wisdom lightly, like the fruit
Which in our winter woodland looks a flower.
Tennyson, A Dedication.

3. In a still more limited sense, an edible succulent product of a plant, normally covering and including the seeds, as the apple, orange, lemon, peach, pear, plum, a berry, a melon, etc.; in a collective sense, such products in the aggregate.

But of all manner of meats, the most dangerous is that which is of fruites (fruitz crudz), as cherres, small cherries (guingues), great cherries (guacognes).
Du Guiz's Introduction, p. 1073, quoted in Babcock Book (E. E. T. S.), Index, p. 85.

Or little pitted speck in garnished fruit,
That rotting inward slowly moulders all.
Tennyson, Melvin and Vivien (song).

4. In bot., the matured ovary of a plant, consisting of the seeds and their pericarp, and including whatever may be incorporated with it; also, the spores of cryptogams and the organs necessary to them. The kinds of fruit are very numerous, and differ greatly in character and degree of complexity. They have also received many names, but they may for the most part be grouped under the following classes: simple fruits, which consist of a single matured pistil; aggregate fruits, composed of a cluster of carpels belonging to the same flower, and crowded together upon the common receptacle; multiple or collective fruits, formed by the aggregation of the pistils of several flowers into one mass; and accessory or anthocarpous fruits, in which the true pericarp (belonging essentially to one of the preceding groups) is incorporated with or enclosed by an enlargement of some adjacent organ or organs, which becomes the most conspicuous portion of the fruit.

5. The produce of animals; offspring; young: as, the fruit of the womb, of the loins, of the body.

When a shepe is with frute, heing the thunder she custeth her frute and bringeth it ded to the worlde.
Habses Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 221.

The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David, . . . Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne. Ps. cxlxi. 11.

King Edward a fruit, true hel to the English crown.
Shak. 3 Hen. VI., iv. 4.

6. A product in general; anything produced by or resulting from effort of any kind, or by or from any cause; outcome, effect, result, or consequence: as, the fruits of victory; the fruit of folly.

They shall eat the fruit of their doings. Isa. lli. 10.

Mr. Vane declared the occasion of this meeting . . . and the fruit aimed at, viz. a more firm and friendly understanding of minds.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, l. 211.

The final and permanent fruits of liberty are wisdom, moderation, and mercy.
Macaulay, Milton.

Brandied fruit. See brandied. Compound fruits, such fruits as consist of several ovaries. Forbidden fruit. See forbidden. Small fruits, fruits raised in market gardens, such as strawberries, raspberries, and currants.

fruit (frŭt), v. i. [< fruit, n.] To produce fruit; come into bearing.

Curiously enough, at a little distance from the sandy levels or alluvial flats of the sea shore, the sea-loving cocoa nut will not bring its nuts to perfection. It will grow, indeed, but it will not thrive or fruit in due season.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 50.

In the latitude of Southern Pennsylvania and Virginia, it is rather common for this exot. [the ginkgo tree] to fruit.
Science, VI. 103.

fruit-dot (frŭt'dot), n. In bot., the sorus of ferns.

fruit-drier (frŭt'drŭ'er), n. An apparatus for evaporating and curing fruit, berries, and vegetables. The simplest form is a sheet iron stove having a number of shelves arranged as battle plates or deflectors to cause the hot air to traverse all the spaces between the shelves. The larger driers are buildings furnished with towers sometimes 40 feet high within which are arranged endless chains supporting at intervals trays of wire netting on which the fruit is placed. A fire is maintained at the base of the tower, and the heated air rises through it, the products of combustion passing away through a chimney. The fresh cut fruit is laid on the lower tray next the furnace. When full it is raised by means of the chains, and another tray of fruit is put in. By this arrangement the steam from the fresh fruit rises to the trays above, keeping the fruit bathed in ascending vapor. By the time the fruit reaches the top of the tower it has parted with nearly all its moisture and is ready to be packed in dry boxes. Fruit-driers of the latter kind are extensively used in various parts of the United States. Also called evaporator.

fruited (frŭ'ted), a. [< fruit + -ed.] Bearing fruit.

deceit. N. Morton, New England's Memorial, p. 186.

I endeavoured to take the advantage of every disappointment, to improve their good sense in proportion as they were frustrated in ambition. Goldsmith, Vicar, xlii.

Syn. Frustrate, Foil, Thwart, Baffle, Balk, are strong words, expressing the complete defeat of any plan or endeavor. Frustrate, to make vain, cause to be in vain, bring to naught. Foil, to stop, render useless. (Foil is not thought to be derived from the use of a foil in fencing, but is associated with it in many minds, and in meaning corresponds with the turning aside of a sword by the address of a fencer.) Thwart, literally, to stop by a bar or barrier, cross effectively, defeat. Baffle, to check at all points or completely and promptly, so that one is at a loss what to do. Balk, to stop in a course, make unable to proceed in a given direction. Perhaps baffle expresses most of confusion of mind or bewilderment, and balk most of annoyance or vexation.

Every mode which the government invented seems to have been easily frustrated, either by the stupidity of the parties themselves, or by that general understanding which enabled the people to play into one another's hands. I. D'Israeli, Curios. of Lit., IV, 237.

O! be not proud, nor brag not of thy might,
For mastering her that fold'd the god of fight!

Shak., Venus and Adonis, I, 114.

He hath . . . thwarted my bargains.

Shak., M. of V., III, 1.

For Freedom's battle once begun, . . .
Though baffled off, is ever won.

Byron, Ode on Liberty, I, 122.

I would not brook my fear
Of the other; with a woin I balked his fame.

Tennyson, Fair Women.

frustrate (frus'trat), a. [L. frustratus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Vain; ineffectual; useless; unprofitable; null; void; of no effect.

Their baptism was in all respects as frustrate as their crim [confirmation]. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v, 66.

The sea mocks
Our frustrate search on land.

Shak., Tempest, III, 3.

The swain in vain his frustrate labour yields,
And famish'd dies amidst his ripen'd fields.

Pope, Windsor Forest, I, 55.

2. Defeated.

And now that my lord be not defeated and frustrate of his purpose. Judith xi, 11.

These men fall as often as the rest in their projects, and are as usually frustrate of their hopes.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 102.

frustrately (frus'trat-ly), adv. In vain.

Great bus and dames, as she their towns past by,
Wist her their daughter-in-law, but frustrately.

Virgil, tr. of Virgil (1632).

frustration (frus'trā-shon), n. [L. frustratio (n-), < frustrare, frustrari, frustrate: see frustrate.] 1. The act of frustrating; disappointment; defeat.

At length they received some letters from y^e adventurers, . . . by which they heard of their further crosses and frustrations. Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 123.

He breaks off the whole session, and dismisses them and their grievances with scorn and frustration.

Milton, Eikonoklastes.

2. Specifically, in astrol., the cutting off or preventing, by one aspect, of anything shown by another.

frustrative (frus'trā-tiv), a. [frustrate + -ive.] Tending to frustrate or defeat; disappointing; thwarting.

frustratory (frus'trā-tō-ri), a. [= F. frustrator = Pr. frustratori = Sp. Pg. It. frustratorio, < L. frustratorius, deceptive, deceitful, < frustrator, a deceiver, delayer, < L. frustrare, frustrari, deceive, frustrate: see frustrate.] Making void or of no effect; that renders null.

Bartolus restrains this to a frustratory appeal.

Aylife, Parergon.

frustret, v. t. [OF. frustrer, F. frustrer, < L. frustrare, frustrate: see frustrate.] To frustrate.

Have these that yet doo crawl
Upon all four, and cannot stand at all,
Withstood your fury, and repulst your powers,
Frustret your rana, fered your flying towers!

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Decey.

frustule (frus'tül), n. [L. frustulum, a small piece, little bit, dim. of L. frustum: see frus-

frust. 1. A small fragment. [Rare.]—2. The silicious shell of a diatom; a testule. It consists of two valves, one somewhat larger than the other, and closing over like the lid of a box. The back of each valve is called the side of the frustule; the surface marked by the line of juncture, the front. See cut under Diatomea.

frustulent (frus'tū-lent), a. [L. frustulentus, full of small pieces, < frustum, a small piece; see frustum.] Abounding in fragments. [Rare.]

Fucaceae (fū-kā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Fucus + -aceae.] A group of coarse olive-green seaweeds belonging to the Oosporeae. The plants are attached by a disk-like base from which the fronds arise, usually branching dichotomously, and often provided with air-bladders. The group is characterized by the production of numerous antherozoids in sacs and oogones; 1 to a 16 mother-cell, both organs being contained in conceptacles immersed in the frond, and produced hermaphroditically or disclosely. (See cuts under conceptacle and antheridium.) The group is widely diffused (its principal representatives in northern latitudes are the species of Fucus or rock-weed. See cut under Fucus). In the southern hemisphere, especially on the Australian coast, the forms are varied and curious. Sargassum is the genus whose floating forms characterize the Sargasso sea.

fucaceous (fū-kā'shūs), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Fucaceae.

fucate (fū'kāt), a. [< L. fucatus, painted, colored, disguised, pp. of fucare, paint, color, dye, rouge, < fucus; see fucus.] Painted; disguised with paint; hence, disguised in any way; dissimulating.

fuchsia (fō'kū), n. [G. = E. for.] In German universities, a student of the first year; a freshman. Compare burnt fox, under burnt.

Fuchsia (fū'shī-ā or fō'kū-sī-ā), n. [NL., named by Plumier (1703) in honor of the German botanist Leonhard Fuchs (1501-66). The name Fuchs = E. Fox, from the animal so called: see fox.¹ 1. A genus of highly ornamental shrubs and small trees, of the order Onagraceae. There are about 50 species, natives of the mountains of Mexico and of the Andes, with 2 species in New Zealand. They have opposite leaves, a colored tubular calyx with 4-parted limb, 4 petals on the throat of the tube, and a pulpy lacinate fruit. The numerous varieties which are common in cultivation, with drooping flowers and a short calyx tube, are believed to have originated from the most part from the Chilean species, F. macrocarpa. Some other species are occasionally met with in greenhouses.

2. [L. c.] A plant of the genus Fuchsia.

Fuchsi (fuk'si-an), a. Pertaining to the Prussian mathematician Lazarus Fuchs (born 1833). — Fuchsi function [name given by Poincaré in 1881]. See function. — Fuchsi group. See group.

fuchsin, fuchsine (fok'sin), n. [< fuchs-ia + -in, -ine.] An aniline dye prepared by the action of weak oxidizing agents, such as arsenic acid, nitrobenzene, etc., on commercial aniline oil, and subsequent treatment of the rosaniline so formed with common salt. It is a hydrochloride of rosaniline, crystallizing in tablets of a brilliant green color which are soluble in water, forming in solution a deep red liquid used for dyeing silk and wool, and sometimes for printing cotton. Whens are sometimes colored red with it. It appears in commerce under various names, as magenta, rosine, rubine, new red, etc.

fuchsite (fuk'sit), n. [Named after Johann N. Fuchs, a distinguished chemist and mineralogist.] A variety of muscovite, or common mica, containing a small amount of chromium. It has a green color. Also called chrome-mica.

fucl, n. Plural of fucus, 3.

fuclphagous (fu-sif'ag-us), a. Same as facivorous.

fuclivorous (fu-siv'o-rus), a. [< L. fucus, seaweed, + vorare, devour.] Devouring alga; feeding on seaweeds: applied to sirenians, as the manatee and the dugong, which have this habit.

fuclid (fuk'oid), a. and n. [< L. fucus, seaweed, + -oid.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or resembling seaweeds, especially those belonging to the Fucales; also applied to species of Phaeosporae, which are sometimes classed as Fuclidae. — 2. Containing or characterized by impressions of fuclids or by markings resembling those made by fuclids. Thus, the "fucloidal sandstone" of Sweden is characterized by various markings of this kind. The Canada gall-grit of New York exhibits forms curving like the feathers of a cock's tail, to which the name of Fuclodes cauda galli was originally given, but which are now referred to the genus Tamurus. Also fuclantal, fuclans.

II. n. An alga belonging to the Fuclidae — that is, to the Fucales or to the Phaeosporae.

fucloidal (fu-koi'dal), a. [< fuclid + -al.] Same as fuclid.

Fuclides (fuk'oid-es), n. pl. [NL., < fuclid + -es.] In Agardh's botanical classification, the same as Melanosperma of Harvey, now referred to Phaeosporae and Fucales; used by some authors as synonymous with Fucales.

Fuclides (fu-koi'dez), n. [NL., < fucus + Gr. -ides, form.] A generic name given by Brongniart, and vaguely and indefinitely applied to fossil marine plants of different characters, but which were supposed to resemble seaweeds belonging to the Fucales. Many of the plants originally described under the name Fuclides have received other generic names, as their characters have been more or less satisfactorily made out. See Palaophycus and Tamurus.

fuclous (fu'kus), a. Same as fuclid.

fucus (fu'kus), n. [L., rock-lichen, orchil, used as a red dye for woolen goods, hence red or purple in color, rouge, pretense, disguise, < Gr. φαις, seaweed, sea-wrack, tangle, rouge.] 1. A paint; a dye; especially, a paint for the face; rouge; hence, a disguise; a pretense; a sham.

Amo. Can you help my complexion, here?
Per. O yes, sir, I have an excellent mineral fucus for the purpose. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

Here is the burned powder of a hog's jaw bone, to be laid with the oil of white poppy, an excellent fucus to kill morpew. Baker and Webster, Westward Ho, l. 1.

She must have no fucus but blushings.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), l. 716.

No fucus, nor vain supplement of art,
Shall falsify the language of my heart.
Sandys, Paraphrase of Job, p. 82.

2. [cap.] A genus of Fucales, characterized by dichotomously branching fronds in which there is no distinction of stem and leaves, and which are provided with a midrib and often with air-bladders. The plants are either hermaphrodite or dioecious. The conceptacles containing the fruit are in a terminal part of the frond. Formerly all marine algae were included in this genus, but it is now limited as above. The species of Fucus are known as rockweeds, and form the principal vegetation of the rocks exposed at low tide in northern regions.

3. Pl. fucl (fu'-si). Any fucaecous seaweed.

fucus (fu'kus), v. t. [< fucus, n.] To paint; dye.

The albyl... uttering sentences altogether thoughtful and serious, neither fucus'd nor perturbed.
Matur's Morals (trans.) (La-tham.)

fucosol (fu'kus-ol), n. [< L. fucus, seaweed, + -ol.] An oil, similar to the furfural of bran, produced from seaweeds.

fucl (fucl), n. [Sc.; prob. of Scand. origin.] The scut or tail of the hare, cony, etc.

Ye maulkins, cock your fucl fu' braw,
Withouten dread.
Your mortal fae is now awa' Burns, Tam Samson's Elegy.

fucl² (fucl), n. [Appar. < fucl¹, n.] Woolen waste; the refuse of new wool taken out in the scribbling process, which is mixed with mungo for use. See mungo, shoddy.

fudder (fud'er), n. A dialectal variant of fother.
fuddle (fud'l), v.; pret. and pp. fuddled, ppr. fuddling. [Origin obscure; hardly another form of fuzzle, q. v.] 1. trans. To make foolish or stupid with drink; make intoxicated.

And also comes Mr. Hollier a little fuddled, and so did talk nothing but Latin, and laugh, that it was very good sport to see a sober man in such a humour, though he was not drunk to scandal.
Pepys, Diary, III. 414.
They were half fuddled, but not I; for I mixed water with my wine.
Scott, Journal to Stella, vii.

II. intrans. To drink to excess.
Every thing fuddles; then that I,
Is't any reason should be dry?
Poems by Various Writers, 1711.

fuddle (fud'l), n. [< fuddle, v.] Strong drink.

And no, said I, we sup'd our fuddle,
As women in the straw do cuddle,
Till every man had drown'd his noddle.
Hudobas Redivivus, 1705.

Don't go away; they have had their dose of fuddle (Jam perpetrant).
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, p. 125.

fuddle-cap (fud'l-kap), n. A hard drinker. [Eng.]

Having overnight carry'd my Indian friend to the Tavern, . . . I introduced his pagan worship into a Christian society of true protestant fuddle caps.
Tom Brown, Works, III. 93.

fuddler (fud'ler), n. A drunkard.

fudge (fuj), v.; pret. and pp. fudged, ppr. fudging. [A dial. word, of obscure origin.] 1. trans. 1. To poke with a stick. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

— 2. To foist.
Now let in see your supposes . . . That last suppos is fudged in — why, would you cram these upon me for a couple?
Foote, The Bankrupt, li. 2.

balcony, and out shouted the mob again. Dickens, Pickwick Papers.

The glasses and mugs are filled, and then the fugleman strikes up the old sea song. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 2.

fugue (fūg), n. [F., < It. fuga, also fugga, a flight, a fugue, < L. fuga, a flight, < fugere, flee;

see fugitive.] In music, a polyphonic composition based upon one, two, or even more themes, which are enunciated by the several voices or parts in turn, subjected to various kinds of contrapuntal treatment, and gradually built up into a complex form having somewhat distinct divisions or stages of development and a marked climax at the end. The most general divisions of a fugue are the exposition, the development, and the conclusion. A strict fugue is one in which each division is developed symmetrically and in a purely contrapuntal manner, while a free fugue is one that is irregular or incomplete in plan or detail. (a) In the exposition, the usually presented by all the voices in turn, as in the exaltation, but frequently so rapidly that the entries overlap. Such an overlapping section is called the stretto. In connection with this, and usually as the final section, a pedal point is often introduced. The fugue is the consummate form of the polyphonic style of composition, requiring for its successful production a mastery of all the devices of counterpoint, as well as a very high grade of inventive and constructive genius. The greatest writers of fugues are J. S. Bach (1685-1750) and G. F. Handel (1685-1759).

His vibrant touch
Instinct through all proportions, low and high,
Flod and pursued transverse the resonant fugue.
Milton, P. L., xl. 503.

And that her reign had here its last fulfilling.
Milton, Nativity, st. 10.

fulfilment (fūl'fīl'mēt), n. [< fulfil + -ment.] A filling or carrying out; performance; accomplishment; completion; as, the fulfilment of prophecy; the fulfilment of one's expectations or duties.

With what entire confidence ought we to wait for the fulfilment of all his other promises in their due time!
H. Blair, Works, I. v.

fulness, n. [Irreg. < fulfil + -ness.] That which fills all things.

That we, which are a little earth, should rather move towards God than that he, which is fulness and can come no whither, should move towards us.
Donne, Letters, iv.

fulgency (ful'jen-si), n. [< fulgēre (t) + -cy.] The quality of being fulgent; brightness; splendor; glitter. [Poetical.]

fulgent (ful'jent), a. [= Sp. fulgente, < L. fulgens, ppr. of fulgere, flash, lighten, gleam, glitter (cf. fulgor, lightning: see fulgor, fouder); allied to flagrare, burn, flamma (for flagma), flame, Gr. φηγναι, burn, shine, Skt. √ bhṛāj, shine, AS. blāc, shining, pale, E. bleak, etc.: see flame, flagrant, bleak, phlox, phlegm, etc.] 1. Shining; very bright; dazzling. [Poetical.]

At last, as from a cloud, his fulgent head
And shape star-bright appeared, or brighter.
Milton, P. L., I. 449.

But other Thracians, who their former name Retained in Asia, fulgent motions wore.
Glover, Leonidas, iv.

2. In her., having rays, as a star or sun.
fulgently (ful'jent-li), adv. In a fulgent manner; dazzlingly.

fulgid (ful'jid), a. [= Sp. fulgido = Pg. fulgido, < L. fulgidus, flashing, glittering, shining, < fulgere, flash, etc.: see fulgent.] 1. Flashing; glittering; shining; gleaming; dazzling; as, 'fulgid weapons,' Pope. Specifically—2. In entom.: (a) Of a bright, fiery red. (b) Of a reddish-brown diaphanous color with red reflections, as displayed on the wings of certain Hymenoptera.

fulgidity (ful'jid'i-ti), n. [= It. fulgidità; as fulgid + -ity.] The state or quality of being fulgid; splendor.

fulgor (ful'gor), n. [= OE. fulgor, fulgour, fulgweor = Sp. fulgor = It. fulgore, < L. fulgor, lightning, a flash of lightning, a flash, < fulgere, flash: see fulgent. Cf. fouder.] Splendor; dazzling brightness.

By the bright honour of a Milanese, and the resplendent fulgor of this stele.

Marston, Antonio and Mellida, Ind., p. 4.

If thou canst not endure the sunbeams, how canst thou endure that fulgor and brightness of him that made the sun?
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 566.

Fulgura (ful'gō-rā), n. [NL., < L. Fulgura, a goddess of lightning, < fulgor, lightning: see fulgor.] A genus of homopterous insects, giving name to the family Fulguridae; the lantern-flies. They are remarkable for the prolongation of the forehead into an empty vesicular expansion, and are so named because it has been asserted that the lantern-fly proper (F. lanternaria), a native of Guiana, emits a strong light from this inflated projection. The evidence of this luminosity, however, is more than doubtful. A Chinese species has, on equally equivocal testimony, been called F. candalaria. See lantern-fly.

Fulgurida (ful'gor'i-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Fulgura + -ida.] The lantern-flies proper; the Fulgurida in a restricted sense, or a subfamily of Fulgurida in a broad sense.

Fulguridæ (ful'gor'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Fulgura + -idæ.] A family of hemipterous insects, variously constructed, sometimes including most of the homopterous forms of the order, sometimes greatly restricted to forms related to the lantern-flies, and then equivalent to the subfamily Fulgurida or Fulgurinae. See the extract, in which the family is characterized in a large sense.

The family Fulguridæ is distinguished by the presence of the great lantern-flies, and includes also a host of other species of very diverse forms and of many varieties of structure. It contains forms which might have been mistaken for butterflies and moths, and others which closely

F, fulcrum; L, lever.

Fulgorida . . . genera of Neuroptera. . . They may be recognized by the compressed, vertical, often carinated face, and by the trisect-shaped antennae being set into a button-shaped base on the sides of the cheeks beneath the round eyes, and below which later a small ocellus appears. The wing-covers are generally opaque, and narrower than the wings. . . The family is now divided into thirteen sub-families. Stand. Nat. Hist., 11, 229.

Fulgorinae (ful-gō-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Fulgura + -inae.] A subfamily of homopterous hemipterous insects, the lantern-flies: same as Fulgorida.

Fulgur (ful-gēr), n. [NL., < L. fulgur, flashing, lightning, < fulgere, flash, lighten: see fulgent.] A genus of buccinids, the typical species of which (F. carica) has reddish or brownish streaks suggesting lightning. It is typical of the subfamily Fulgorinae.

fulgurant (ful-gū-rant), a. [L. fulgurans (t)-s, ppr. of fulgurare, lighten: see fulgurate.] Flashing, as lightning.

Though pithy blasts from Hell upborn
Stop the outgoings of the morn,
And Nature play her fiery games,
In this fore'd night, with fulgurant flames.
Dr. H. More, Resolution.

That erect form, flashing brow, fulgurant eye.
Browning, Ring and Book, l. 314.

fulgurata (ful-gū-rā-tā), n. [L. fulguratus, pp. of fulgurare, flash: see fulgurate.] A tube used in observing the spectrum of a substance liberated from a solution by electric discharge.

fulgurate (ful-gū-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. fulgurated, ppr. fulgurating. [L. fulguratus, pp. of fulgurare (> lt. fulgurare, fulgurare = Sp. Pg. fulgurar, lighten, flash, < fulgur, flashing, lightning, < fulgere, flash, lighten: see fulgent.) To flash as lightning: as, fulgurating clouds.

If enclosed in a glass vessel well stopped, it sometimes would fulgurate, or throw out little flashes of light, and sometimes fill the whole vial with waves of flames.
Philosophical Transactions, No. 184.

fulguration (ful-gū-rā-shon), n. [L. fulguratio (n-), lightning, < fulgurare, lighten: see fulgurate.] 1. The act of lightening, or flashing with light.

The shine gave such a lightning from one to another, so as you should be forced to turn them (the eyes) elsewhere, or not too steadfastly to behold their fulguration.
Bacon, Hist. Septuagint (1623), p. 37.

2. In assaying, the sudden brightening of a melted globule of gold or silver in the cupel of the assayer, when the last film of vitreous lead or copper leaves its surface.

Fulgorinae (ful-gū-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Fulgura + -inae.] A subfamily of buccinoid gastropoda, typified by the genus Fulgor. The species are mostly of large size, and are characteristic of the eastern and southern coasts of the United States. They have a pear-shaped shell with a long anterior canal and a single fold around the base of the columella. The most common species are Fulgor carica and Sycolypus canaliculatus.

fulgurite (ful-gū-rīt), n. [L. fulgur, lightning, + -ite².] A tube formed, usually in loose sand, but sometimes in the solid rock, by lightning; a lightning-tube. Fulgurites are the result of the passage of the electric current through the soil, sand, or rock, producing more or less complete fusion in the vicinity of the path traversed. They usually descend vertically, but sometimes obliquely, and they occasionally branch toward the bottom. They are rarely more than one or two inches in diameter. The effect of lightning is sometimes seen, and occasionally on a large scale, where no proper fulgurites have been formed, but rather a sort of honeycombed condition of the rock, resembling that produced in wood by the boring of the teredo as observed on Little Ararat, and described by Abich. For the rock (andesite) thus vitrified and altered this geologist proposes the name fulgurite andante.

fulgurous (ful-gū-rus), a. [L. fulgur, lightning, + -ous.] Lightning-like; appearing or acting like lightning.

A fulgurous impetuosity almost beyond human.
Carlyle, Misc., III, 194.

fulgury (ful-gū-rī), n. [L. fulgur, lightning, + -y³.] Lightning. Cockram.

fulham, n. See fulam.

Fuligina (fū-lī-kā), n. [L., also fulix (fulie-), a coot.] The typical genus of coots of the subfamily Fulicinae and family Rallidae. The body is depressed and shaped like a duck's, with thick underplumage; the feet are lobate; the toes are furnished with large flaps; the bill is stout, with the culmen running up on the forehead as a frontal shield; the head is not caruncled; the tail is short, cocked up, and is 12-feathered; the wings are short and rounded; the tibiae are bare below; and the plumage is scaly. There are about 10 species, of most parts of the world. The common European coot is Fuligula atra; that of the United States is F. americana. (See coot.) The common American or cinereous coot, F. americana, is also called marsh hen, marsh hen, moor hen, pond hen, platterer, stutterer, quillow, pellet, one-eyed, crumbly, crum-duck, whitell, henbill, blue-pole, lumpy-billed coot, wood-coot, shugler, etc.

Fulicaria (fū-lī-kā-rī-s), n. pl. [NL., < Fulica + -ariae.] In Nitzsch's classification of birds (1829), a superfamily group comprising the coots and their allies.

fulicarian (fū-lī-kā-rī-an), a. Coot-like; of or pertaining to the Fulicinae or Fulicariae.

Fulicinae (fū-lī-sī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Fulica + -inae.] A subfamily of Rallidae, embracing the completely natatorial forms of the family, or those which have the body depressed and the feet pinnated; the coots. The characters are nearly the same as those of the genus Fulica. The Fulicinae are most nearly related to the Gallinulines or water hens, gallinules or sultans. See coot under coot.

fulicine (fū-lī-sīn), a. Of or pertaining to the Fulicinae.

fuliginose (fū-lī-jī-nōs), a. Same as fuliginous. [Rare.]

fuliginosity (fū-lī-jī-nōs-i-tē), n. [= F. fuliginositas = Pg. fuliginositate; as fuliginose + -ity.] The condition or quality of being fuliginous; sootiness; matter deposited by smoke; smoldering stuff.

In the old Marquis there dwells withal a crabbedness, atill cross-grained humour, a latent fury and fuliginosity very perverting.
Carlyle, Misc., IV, 70.

fuliginous (fū-lī-jī-nus), a. [Also fuliginose; = F. fuliginosus = Sp. Pg. fuliginoso = It. fuliginoso, < L. fuliginosus, full of soot, sooty, < L. fuligo (fuligin-), soot: see fuligo.] 1. Pertaining to or having the color of soot; sooty.

These few particulars I have but mentioned to animate improvements and ingenious attempts of detecting more cheap and useful processes for ways of charking coals, peat, and the like fuliginous materials.
Evelyn, Sylva, xxx.

Sometimes, when the hour of trial came, it was found that the colors had become strangely transmuted in the firing, and had faded into ashen pallor, or had darkened into the fuliginous hue of forest mould.
L. Hearn, Tale of the Porcelain God.

2. Pertaining to smoke; resembling smoke; dusky.

London, by reason of the excessive coldness of the air, hindering the ascent of the smoke, was so filled with the fuliginous steams of the sea coals, that hardly could one see across the streets.
Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 24, 1694.

3. Specifically, in zoöl. and bot. very dark, opaque brown; of the color of soot.

fuliginously (fū-lī-jī-nus-lī), adv. In a smoky or sooty manner; duskiely.

Her impulse nothing may restrain
To rear some breathless vap' of flowers,
Or shrubs fuliginously green.
Shelton, in Rural Elegance fuligo (fū-lī-gō), n. [L. fuligo (> lt. fuligine, fuligine = Pg. fuligine), soot; perhaps allied to fumus, smoke.] 1. Soot.

Camphire, of a white substance by its fumes affordeth a deep black.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., VI, 12.

2. cap. [NL.] A genus of Myxomycetes, containing a single species, called flower of tan. It is allied to Phycomyces, but has an aethidium produced by the union of several plasmodia and composed of interwoven vein-like sporangia. The central stadium of the aethidium is filled with the capillitium and spores, the outer contains no spores, but has plentiful deposits of lime. The plant may attain a breadth of 12 inches and a thickness of 1 inch, or may remain quite small.

fuligokali (fū-lī-gō-kā-lī), n. [L. fuligo + kali, see alkali.] 2. A preparation containing carbonate of potash and soot, used in cutaneous diseases. Dunlopian.

Fuligula (fū-lī-gū-lā), n. [NL., appar. for Fulicula, dim. of L. fulica, a coot: see Fulica.] The typical genus of sea-ducks of the subfamily Fuligininae. The name was originally based by Stephens (1824) upon the red-headed pochard, F. fuligula. It has been given to all the sea-ducks excepting the eiders, but is now usually restricted to such species as the pochards and scaups, or redheads and blackheads. The common pochard is F. ferula. The scaup is often called F. marila. Many generic names of sea-ducks, as Fulcr, Aythya, etc., are partial synonyms of Fuligula. See coot under scaup.

Fuligininae (fū-lī-gū-lī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Fuligula + -inae.] A subfamily of Anatidae, having the hind toe lobate; the sea-ducks. The characters otherwise are much as in Anatidae, but the feet are usually larger in proportion, with relatively shorter tarsal longer toes, and broader web; they are also placed further back, impeding locomotion on land, but increasing swimming powers. The species are usually good divers, and they feed upon animal food to a greater extent than river-ducks. They are by no means exclusively marine or maritime. The pochards, scaups, canvasbacks, golden eyes, long-tailed and horn-quinn ducks, scoters, eiders, etc., all belong to this subfamily.

fuliginous (fū-lī-gū-lī-nus), a. Of or pertaining to the Fuligininae. Cowen.

fulimart, n. An original misprint, in the passage quoted, for fulmart, fulmart, the same as fulmart: erroneously cited since as an actual variant of fulmart.

With glia to betray the very vermin of the earth. As, namely, the stoat, the fulmart, the ferret, the polecat, etc.
T. Walton, Complete Angler, l. 1.

Fulix (fū-līks), n. [L., a coot: see Fulica.] A genus of sea-ducks: a partial synonym of Fuligula. C. J. Sundvall, 1836.

fulker, n. [Cf. focker, fogger.] A pawnbroker. Durrie.

Ce. I lay thee my faith and honesty in pawn.
Im. A pretty pawn; the fulkers will not lend you a farthing upon it.
Gateshead, Supposes, II, 8.

Whittier, Starr King.

The full control or command of the active organs implies the ability to bring them into activity when the actual circumstances of the moment deter from action.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 661.

I quickened my pace again, and before I knew it, was in a full run.
C. D. Warner, In the Wilderness, II.

3. Filled or rounded out; complete in volume; ample in extent; copious; comprehensive; as, a full body or voice; a full statement or argument; a full confession.

I did never know so full a voice issue from so empty a heart.
Shak., Ham. V., l. 4.

No luxury, blythe, and full of love.
As Heaven had lent her all his grace.
Shak., Pericles, I, Prolog.

However, to please her, I allowed Sophie to apparel her in one of her short, full multi-tracks.
Charlotte Yonge, Jane Eyre, xvii.

An underlip, you may call it a little too ripe, too full.
Tennyson, Maud, II.

It is not the longest lives that have been the most full. Rabach died when he was thirty-seven, while Michael Angelo lived to be ninety. J. P. Clarke, Self Culture, p. 87.

4. Filled by or engrossed with the quantity, number, volume, importance, contemplation, or the like of: as, a house full of people; life is full of perplexities; she is full of her own conceits; also, abounding in.

We are naturally presumptuous and vain; full of ourselves, and regardless of everything besides.
Sp. Alferbury, Hermans, l. 1.

In desiring a pleasure strongly the mind is, as we commonly say, "full of the idea."
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 879.

Shak., Hen. VIII., 1. 2.

full-dress (fŭl'dres), a. 1. Appropriate to occasions of form or ceremony; as, a full-dress costume. See full dress, under dress.—2. Formal; elaborate; requiring full dress: as, a full-dress reception.

As the climate is warm, the ladies are décolletées, . . . and the row of bright shoulders, as they all kneel in church, is worthy of a full-dress occasion.
T. Winthrop, Isthmiana.

full-driven, a. [ME. ful driven, ful dryve.] Fully driven or clenched; completed; made up.

This bargeyn is ful dryve, for we ben knyght.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 404.

fuller¹ (fŭl'ér), n. [ME. fuller, fullere, fullare, etc. (cf. OD. roller, D. roller, a fuller, appar. after the E.), AS. fullere (Mark ix. 3, and once in a gloss), a fuller, an accom. form, with suffix -ero denoting the agent, L. fullo(n)-, a fuller; origin unknown: see full². The sense of 'bleacher' appears to be merely incidental; it is made more prominent by the passage in Mark ix. 3. The native E. word for 'fuller' is walker, q. v.] 1. One who fuls; one whose occupation is the fulling of cloth.

His clothis ben maid whynnyge and white ful moche as snow, and which manner clothis a fullere, or walkere of cloth, may not make white on erthe.
Wyclif, Mark ix. 3.

To come then to the mystere of fullers craft: first they wash and scour a piece of cloth with the earth of Sardina, then they perfume it with the smoke of brimstone, which done, they fall anon to boiling it with cinolla.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxv. 17.

He is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' sope.
Mal. iii. 2.

2. The stamp of a stamping-mill or fulling-machine. Fullers' earth, a material used in the operation of fulling. It consists of clay mixed with just enough fine silicious material to take away its plasticity, so that it falls to a fine powder when mixed with water. Some silicious rocks on decomposing become converted into a material which can be used as fullers' earth. It occurs in various geological positions. In England the so-called fullers' earth group is a thick deposit of gray clay and marl with occasional nodules of earthy limestone. It rests conformably on the inferior Gault, and has a maximum thickness of 400 feet. Only parts of the group are of commercial value.

It is to be noted that four miles to the northward of Doganose there grows no tree on the bank by the water side: and the banks consist of fullers' earth.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 291.

* Money, wife, is the true fullers' earth for reputations, there is not a spot or stain but what it can take out.
Gau, Beggar's Opera, l. 1.

Our fair countrywomen . . . are surely . . . much more valuable commodities than wool or fullers' earth, the exportation of which is so strictly prohibited by our laws, lest foreigners should learn the manufacturing of them.
Chatterfield, Misc. Works, II. xix.

fulmar (ful'mār), n. [< ME. fulmar, fulmare, fulmer, shorter forms of fulmart, fulmart, the polecat: see foulmart.] Same as foulmart.

fulmar² (ful'mār), n. [A transferred use of fulmar, the bird being so called from its extremely strong and persistent odor, and from its habit of ejecting oil from its stomach, through the mouth, when seized or assailed; in allusion to analogous characteristics of the polecat: see fulmart.] The Gael. name fulmar and the NL. generic name Fulmarus are taken from the E. A natorial oceanic bird of the family Procellariidae and genus Fulmarus or some closely related genus; the fulmar petrel. The common fulmar is Fulmarus glacialis, a bird as large as a medium sized gull, and greatly resembling a herring gull in coloration, being white with a pearl-blue mantle and black tips on the primaries, but distinguished by the long tubular nostrils, which lie high upon the ridge of the upper mandible. It inhabits the northern seas in prodigious numbers, breeding in Iceland, Greenland, Spitzbergen, the Shetland and Orkney Islands, the Hebrides, etc. It feeds on fish, the blubber of whales, and any fat, putrid, floating substance that comes in its way. It makes its nest on sea cliffs, and lays only one egg. The natives of the island of St. Kilda, in the Hebrides, value the eggs above those of any other bird, and search for them by the most perilous descent of precipices by means of ropes. The fulmar is also valued for its feathers, its down, and the oil found in its stomach, which is one of the principal products of St. Kilda. When caught or assailed, it lightens itself by discharging the oil from its stomach. There are several closely related species or varieties in the North Pacific. The slender billed fulmar is Fulmarus tenuirostris or Thalasidroma glacialis, widely dispersed over the seas. The giant fulmar, Oceanodroma gigantea, also called bone-breaker, is a sooty-brown or fuliginous species, as large as a small albatross.

fulmart, n. Same as foulmart.

Fulmarus (ful'mā-rus), n. [NL., *< E. fulmar*².] The typical genus of fulmars of the family Procellariidae. The nasal case is long, protuberant, and sedately truncate, with a thin septum; the bill is extremely stout, with hooked upper mandible; and the plumage of the adults is white with a pearl blue mantle, and black tipped primaries. There are several species, of which the common fulmar is the type. See *fulmar*².

fulmen (ful'men), n. [L., lightning that strikes or sets on fire, a thunderbolt, orig. fulgmen*, fulgmen*, < fulgere, flash, lighten: see fulgent.] Lightning; a thunderbolt. [Rare.]

Such wit had current pass'd alone,
Tho' Selwyn's fun had ne'er been known.
G. Burck, To Mr. Cambridge.

Here Whiteford reclines, and, deny it who can,
Though he merrily liv'd, he is now a grave man;
Rare compound of oddity, frolic, and fun,
Who relish'd a joke, and rejoin'd in a pun.
Goldsmith, Retaliation.

That fun, the most English of qualities, which does not reach the height of humour, yet overwhelms even gravity itself with a laughter in which there is no sting or bitterness.
Mrs. Oliphant, Sheridan, p. 54.

figure of fun. See figure. - In fun, as a joke, by way of making fun, not seriously; as, it was said in fun. - Like fun, in a lively, energetic, or rapid manner. [Colloq.]

That [noise] stopp'd all of a sudden, and the bolts went to like fun.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, II. 2.

Not to see the fun of, not to take as a joke; to be unwilling to put up with.

Young Miller did not see the fun of being imposed on in that fashion.
W. Black.

Homogeneous function, an algebraic polynomial in two variables, all the terms being of the same degree.

— Hyperbolic function. See hyperbolic. — Hyperbolic function. (a) A Gudermannian function. (b) One of several functions related to $y = 1 + k^2 \sinh^2 \phi$ in the same manner in which ordinary elliptic functions are related to $y = 1 - k^2 \sin^2 \phi$, being merely transformed elliptic functions. — Hyperdistributive, hyperelliptic, hyperfuchsian, hyperspherical, etc., function. See the adjectives. — Icosahedral function. See icosahedral.

Illegitimate function, one which follows one law for some values of the variables and another for others. — Implicit function, one which is defined by an equation of which the function does not form one member. — Integrable function, a function such that, if the integral between two values of the variable be divided into infinitesimal parts, and each of these be multiplied by the maximum value of the function, then the sum of the products has a determinate value irrespective of the mode of separation of the interval into infinitesimal parts, so that the function has a determinate integral. — Integral function, a holomorphic function; but with some writers an algebraic polynomial is meant. See entire function.

Intermediary function. See intermediary. — Interpolary function, a kind of function used in interpolation. — Irrational function, a function which cannot be expressed as the ratio of two algebraic polynomials in its variables. — Irreducible function, a function u connected with its variables, x, y , etc., by an equation $F(x, y, \dots) = 0$, which cannot be separated into independent factors. For example, $y = \sqrt{x}$ is an irreducible function, for $(y^2 - x) = 0$ can be separated only into the factors $(y + \sqrt{x})(y - \sqrt{x})$, which have no general meaning independent of each other. If the Riemann's surface of an irreducible function consists of several sheets, these are all connected, and this may be taken as the definition.

Irreproductive function, a reproductive function of order zero. — Iterative function. See iterative. — Jacobian function, one of the functions θ, η , etc., employed by Jacobi as subsidiary to the study of elliptic functions. — J function, the Besselian function of the first kind. — Keplerian function, a function expressed by an equation similar to that of Kepler's problem. — Lacunary function. See lacunary. — Lagrangian function, the kinetic diminished by the potential energy, or by what corresponds to the potential energy in the case of variable forces. — Lamé's function, a kind of Laplace's function in which the three direction cosines enter instead of the radius vector, latitude, and longitude. — Laplace's function, spherical function, or spherical harmonic, a function of two variables analogous to a trigonometrical series, used to express the distribution of any continuous quantity over a surface. A Laplace's function of the n th order is any function Y_n of the two variables μ and ϕ , which satisfies the differential equation

See equation of Laplace's functions, under equation. — Legendrian function, one of the Y_n functions of spherical harmonics. — Limited function, one which has a maximum and a minimum value within some finite interval of the variable. — Longimetric function. See longimetric.

— Major function, a certain function used in the theory of Abelian functions. — Meromorphic, metabolic, modular, monodromic or monotropic, monogenous, monotonous, multiform function. See the adjectives. — Non-uniform function. Same as multiform function.

— Normal function, a spherical harmonic of a higher order. — Numerical generating function, the generating function showing the number of isocyclic invariants of each degree. — Octahedral function. See octahedral. — Odd function, one which changes its sign with the variable. — One-valued function, one which has only one value for each set of values of the variables. — Order of a function, the order of the algebraic differential equation of lowest order which connects the function with its variable. — Ordinary function, a differentiable function which in reference to no axis of abscissas possesses an infinite number of maxima. — Partitively continuous, differentiable, etc., function, a function such that the interval of the variable considered may be so divided into parts that the function is continuous, differentiable, etc., in each part. — Periodic function. (a) As ordinarily understood a function which, whenever the variable is increased by a certain constant, called the period, has its value unchanged. (b) In a generalized sense, a function which has its value unchanged by the substitution for its variable of a certain algebraic function thereof. A periodic function of the second kind is one for which this function is linear. — Perturbative function. See perturbative. — Picard's functions, hypergeometrical functions of two variables. — Plane or planimetric function, a function expressing one of the relations between the areas of the three triangles formed by joining a variable point in a plane to the vertices of a fundamental triangle. — Pf function, the Legendre's coefficient of the n th order, the coefficient of an in the development of $(1 - 2ax + a^2)^{-1/2}$ according to ascending powers of a . — Polydromic or polytropic function, one which is not monotropic. — Polyhedral function. See polyhedral. — Potential function, the function expressing the potential of attractions upon a particle. — Principal function, the time-integral of the Lagrangian function. — Qn function, a harmonic function such that

$$1(y - x) = \sum_{n=1}^{\infty} (2n + 1) Q_n(y) P_n(x).$$

Quasi-periodic function, a function which returns to its value multiplied by a constant when the variable is increased by a certain constant called the quasi-period. — Radical function, a rational, integral, and homogeneous expression in Abelian functions having one characteristic.

Rational and integral function. See entire function. — Rational function, a function whose value in terms of the variable is expressible as a rational fraction. — Reciprocal functions, a pair of functions f and f^{-1} , so related to each other that if y is one of the values of f , then x is one of the values of f^{-1} , and conversely. Each function is also said to be the reciprocal of the other. The term converse would be preferable. — Reproductive function. See reproductive. — Reproductive function of order n , a function such that, for a certain constant a , the equation holds $f(ax) = a^n f(x)$. — Riemann's function, a function satisfying the differential equation of the hypergeometrical series, and defined by Riemann by means of the properties of its critical points. It is denoted by P . — Rosenhain's function, an ultra-elliptic function of the first kind. — Scalar function, a real numerical quantity having one or more values for each point of three-dimensional space. — Sigma function. See sigma. — Similar functions. (a) Functions which admit the same substitutions. (b) Two physical quantities whose several mathematical relations to two other physical quantities are the same. — Sinusoidal function, a simple harmonic. — Spherical function. See Laplace's function. — Stereometric function, a ratio of two of the tetrahedrons formed by joining a variable point in space to the four vertices of a fixed tetrahedron. — Striped function, a function which is represented by a pattern in stripes. — Sturmian function. See Sturmian. — Suppositionless function, a function subject to no general condition whatever — which may, for instance, be either limited or unlimited. — Symmetric function, a function of several variables whose value is never altered by interchanging the values of any two of the variables. — Synectic function. See synectic. — Tetrahedral function. See polyhedral. — Theory of functions, a branch of mathematics which concerns the general properties of different general forms of functions. It is sometimes regarded as embracing the entire theory of the higher functions, such as the gamma function, spherical harmonics, elliptic functions, etc. — Thermodynamic function, the amount of heat which a body will give out in being brought to a standard pressure and temperature. — Theta function. See theta.

Toroidal function, a function serving to express the potential of an anchor ring. — Transcendental function, any function not algebraic. — Trigonometrical functions. See trigonometrical. — Uniform function, a function such that its variable, while remaining within given limits, cannot pass through a cycle of values so as to return to its original value without the function also returning to its original value. — Unlimited function, a function which within every interval has values greater than any predesignate finite limit and other values less than any predesignate finite limit. For example, suppose that $y = 0$ when x is irrational, while $y = C - 10q$ when x is equal to the irreducible fraction p/q . Then, although y never becomes infinite, yet between any two assignable values of x it has values greater than any predesignate positive number and values less than any predesignate negative number. — Vector function, a quantity of the nature of a vector, having magnitude and direction, distributed through space so as to have a definite magnitude and direction at each point. — Velocity function, in hydrodynamics, a scalar function whose partial differential coefficient for a linear displacement of the variable point is equal to the component velocity of the fluid in that direction at that point. — Vital functions, functions immediately necessary to life, as those of the brain, heart, and lungs. — Weierstrassian function. See Weierstrassian. — Xn function, a Legendrian polynomial of the n th order, or function of the latitude and longitude on a sphere, satisfying Laplace's equation. — Yn function, the Laplace's n th coefficient, being what Y_n becomes when for the variable x we substitute $x = \cos \theta \cos \phi + \sin \theta \sin \phi \cos(\psi - \phi)$. — Zeta function. See zeta.

function (fungk'shon), v. t. [< function, n.] To perform a function; work; act; functionate; especially, in physiol., to have a function; do or be something physiologically.

It seems probable that the pollex here given formed the ground of an action in the Insurance Court created by the statute of Elizabeth, . . . which functioned . . . till towards the end of the seventeenth century.

P. Martin, Hist. of Lloyd's, p. 48.

The endodermis also forms the axis of the tentaculocyst, its cells secrete crystalline concretions, and its functions as an obovate. K. H. Lankester, Encyc. Brit. XII, 651.

functional (fungk'shon-al), a. [< ML. functionalis, f. L. functio(-is) function; see function, n.] 1. Pertaining to functions; relating to some office or function.

Myopia is a structural defect; presbyopia is a functional defect. Le Conte, Sight, p. 50.

2. Pertaining to an algebraical operation; as, a functional symbol. — 3. Having the function usual to the part or organ; as, functional wings of an insect (that is, those used for flying). — Functional determinant, disease, equation, etc., see the nouns.

functionality (fungk'shon-al'i-ti), n. [< functional + -ity.] The state of having or being a function.

This peripheral area, which possesses a known and indisputable functionality.

Tr. for Alien. and Neural, VIII, 170.

Functionality, in Analysis, is dependence on a variable or variables. Boole, Brit. IX, 818.

functionalize (fungk'shon-al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. functionalized, ppr. functionalizing. [< functional + -ize.] To place in a function or office; assign some function or office to. Lat. [Rare.]

functionally (fungk'shon-al-i), adv. In a functional manner; by means of functions; specifically, in zool., with reference to function alone; as, the maxillae of crustaceans are morphologically limbs, but functionally jaws.

The elytra of a beetle and the halteres of a fly, though morphologically wings, are not functionally so. Huxley.

Functionally produced modifications have respectively furthered or hindered survival in posterity.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 60.

functionary (fungk'shon-ā-ri), n.; pl. functionaries (-riz). [= F. fonctionnaire = Sp. funcionario = Pg. funcionario, < L. as if functionalis*, < functio(-nis), function; see function, n.] One who holds an office or a trust; as, a public functionary; secular functionaries.

Their republic is to have a first functionary (as they call him), under the name of king, or not, as they think fit. Burke, Thoughts on French Affairs.

functionate (fungk'shon-āt), v. i.; pret. and pp. functionated, ppr. functionating. [< function + -ate.] To act; have or fulfil a function; function.

Thus an image is formed upon the retina, the optic nerve transmits the excitation to its ganglion, this at once functionates, the force called perception is evolved, and the image is perceived. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI, 8.

functionize (fungk'shon-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. functionized, ppr. functionizing. [< function + -ize.] To function. [Rare.]

A soul that is self-conscious is not so singular as a brain functionizing about itself and its own being.

N. Porter, Human Intellect, § 41.

functionless (fungk'shon-less), a. [< function + -less.] Without function or office.

The os coxae in man, though functionless as a tail, plainly represents this part in other vertebrate animals. Darwin, Descent of Man, I, 28.

Adult whales have . . . functionless rudiments of hind limbs imbedded in their flesh. Contemporary Rev., LI, 616.

functus officio (fungk'tus o-fish'i-ō). [L. i. functus, pp. of fungi, perform; officio, abl. of officium, duty, office.] Having performed to the end one's official duty; having fulfilled a function or retired from an office. In law, "an expression applied to an agent or donee of an authority who has performed the act authorized, so that the authority is exhausted and at an end." Rapala and Lawrence, Law Dict.

fund¹ (fund), n. [In lit. sense also fond (see fond⁴), fund being accom. to the L. form; < OF. fond, a bottom, floor, ground, foundation, also a merchant's stock or capital, F. fond, bottom, ground, fonds, estate, pl. fonds, funds, stock. = Pr. fons = Sp. fondo, fundo = Pg. fundo = It. fondo, < L. fundus, bottom, also, in particular, a piece of land, a farm, estate, orig. fundus* = F. bottom; see bottom. Hence (from L. fundus) ult. F. found², foundation, etc.] 1. Bottom. See in the fund, below. — 2. A stock or accumulation of money or other forms of wealth devoted to or available for some purpose, as for the carrying on of some business or enterprise, or for the support and maintenance of an institution, a family, or a person; as, a sinking-fund; the funds of a bank or corporation; the Widows' and Orphans' Fund, etc. A fund may be either active or passive. It is active when the bulk of it is invested in the subjects of the business or enterprise, as merchandise, ships, factories, land, bank loans, etc.; passive when it is invested in such a way (as in real estate or stocks) as to produce a fixed or nearly uniform income, which alone is used for the specific purpose, or when it is used or drawn upon directly for expenses, being insufficient to produce the requisite income by investment, or when it is maintained by collections or contributions for specific objects, as the support of missionaries or of charitable enterprises. Both active and passive funds may be either individual or collective; when collective, an individual interest in the former usually consists of a partnership or the ownership of joint stock, and in the latter of membership or of some right of joint control, unless the contributions are absolute gifts.

The parliament went on slowly in fixing the fund for the supplies they had voted.

Rp. Furnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1808.

3. A store of anything to be drawn upon at pleasure; a stock or main source of supply; especially, an equipment of specific mental resources; a stock of knowledge or mental endowment of any kind; as, a fund of wisdom or good sense; a fund of anecdote.

I was last night visited by a friend of mine, who has an inexhaustible fund of discourse, and never fails to entertain his company with a variety of thoughts and hints that are altogether new and uncommon.

Addison, Adventures of a Shilling.

Tom's severity gave her a certain fund of defiance.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, v. 3.

Orlando Cambrensis had a fund of humour and cleverness that is as noteworthy as his extensive reading.

Strabo, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 120.

Alimentary fund. See alimentary. — Company fund, in the United States army, the savings arising from the economical use of the rations of a company, placed in the hands of the company commander, and used only for the benefit of the enlisted men of the company. — Consolidated funds. See consolidated. — In funds, in possession of available means or resources. — In the fund, at bottom. Darwin.

I know madam does fret you a little now and then, that's true; but in the fund she is the softest, sweetest, gentlest little beauty.

Sir J. Vanbrugh, Confederacy, iv.

On or out of one's own fund, on one's own account. Darwin.

The translating most of the French letters gave me as much trouble as if I had written them out of my own fund.

Toni Brown, Works, i. 171.

I took to him for his resemblance to you, but am grown to love him upon his own fund.

Walpole, Letters, ii. 130.

Post fund, in the United States army, the savings from the allowance of flour at a post bakery, used to defray the expenses of the bakery, for the purchase of garden-seeds, and for the support of post schools, etc. — Public funds, securities issued by a government in return for loans, at a fixed rate of interest, and usually for a definite term of years, in the form of negotiable or transferable bonds of different amounts. Often called simply the funds. — Regimental fund, in the United States army, 50 per cent. of the post fund, after deducting the expenses of the bakery, divided pro rata among the regiments represented by companies at the post, and paid over to the several regimental treasurers for the maintenance of the bands.

Sinking-fund, a fund formed by a government or corporation for the gradual "sinking," wiping out, or reduction of its debt, by various devices for the accumulation of money. (See fund, v. t., 2, end.) The first sinking fund was established by Sir Robert Walpole in England in 1716.

— The funds, originally, in Great Britain, the product of particular taxes, as customs, excise, stamp, etc., pledged by the government for the payment of particular loans and the interest on the same; now, the national or public debt, or the stocks which represent it; as, to have money in the funds. See consols, and consolidated funds (under consolidated).

fund (fun'd), v. t. [fund, n.] 1. To collect and accumulate; store. [Rare.]

Strata of soil fitted to retain heat and fund it, or to dissipate it and cool it. De Quincey, Herodotus.

2. To convert (a floating debt) into capital or stock, or into a more or less permanent debt, represented by bonds for definite sums, bearing interest at a fixed rate, and commonly redeemable within a fixed period of years. That part of the indebtedness of a government or corporation which is payable immediately or soon, so that early provision for payment must be made or forbearance obtained, is called the floating debt. To fund such an indebtedness is to cancel it by including the creditor to take in its place obligations having considerable time to run, and issued, in convenient portions or shares, in the form of interest-bearing bonds or certificates available to the holder as marketable securities, or by procuring a fresh loan on the issue of such obligations, and using the proceeds to pay off the floating indebtedness. To refund a debt is to repeat this process when the time obtained by the funding expires. The funded debt of a body public or corporate is the aggregate of the debt thus provided for. It is approximately the same in amount as the old debt, unless it is increased, as is often the case, by including in it the expenses of funding, or by issuing the obligations below par. The funded debts of governments are spoken of as the public funds and the securities issued are spoken of as stocks or bonds. Such securities when issued by corporations, are usually spoken of in the United States as bonds (the word stocks being applied to shares, which do not represent the debt of a corporation, but ownership in it), and in Great Britain as bonds or debentures. With the funding of a debt is frequently coupled the creation of a sinking-fund for its redemption. See sinking-fund, under fund, n.

fund, v. i. [ME. funden, an earlier form of funden, strive, go; see fund, n.] To go; proceed.

Na linger durst I for him lette.

But forth y funded wyt that free.

As Y god on my Moundan (Child's Ballads, i. 27).

fundable (fun'da-bl), a. [fund, n. + -able.] Capable of being funded or converted into a fund; convertible into bonds.

fundal (fun'dal), a. [fundus + -al.] Pertaining to the fundus; as, fundal attachments.

fundament (fun'da-ment), n. [ME. fundament, fundament, also fondement, fondement (see fundament), < OF. fundament, fondement, F. fondement = Pr. fundamen, fundament = Sp. Pg. fundamento = It. fondamento, < L. fundamētum, foundation, groundwork, base, bottom, < fundare, found, < fundus, the bottom; see fund, n. and fund, v. t.] 1. Foundation; foundment.

2. The anus; the vent; the perineal region.

fundamental (fun-da-men'tal), a. and n. [= F. fundamental = Sp. Pg. fundamental = It. fondamentale, < ML. fundamentalis (in adv. fundamentaliter), < L. fundamentum, foundation; see fundament.] 1. a. Pertaining to the foundation; serving as or being a component part of a foundation or basis; hence, essential; important; original; elementary; as, a fundamental truth or principle; a fundamental law.

And this I take to be a great cause that hath hindered the progression of learning, because these fundamental knowledges have been studied but in passage.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

The law of nature is the only law of laws truly and properly to all mankind fundamental, the beginning and the end of all government. Milton, Free Commonwealth.

When we apply the epithet fundamental either to religion in general or to Christianity in particular, we are supposed to mean something essential to religion or Christianity. Watson, Works, viii. 88.

The most fundamental and far reaching effect of Roman conquest was the decomposition of primitive ideas, political and social, legal and religious.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 257.

Fundamental bass, in music. (a) See fundamental, n. 2. (b) The low tone generated by the tones of a chord. Also called fundamental note. — Fundamental cells, fundamental tissue, in bot., typical or essentially unchanged parenchyma-cells, and the tissue formed of such cells, such as is found in pith, the pulp of leaves and fruit, etc.

Fundamental chord. See chord, 4. — Fundamental color, color-sensation. See the noun. — Fundamental propositions, in logic, certain propositions from which other propositions can be immediately proved, but which can themselves be subordinated to no other propositions.

Fundamental scale of a system of invariants or concomitants, an arithmetical set of such invariants or concomitants. J. J. Sylvester, 1853. The Idea is Cayley's.

Fundamental tone. See fundamental, n. 2. — Fundamental truths, beliefs constituting the foundations and elementary ingredients of every act of knowledge and thought. — Fundamental units, a system of units from which all others can be derived. In the centimeter gram second system, the centimeter, gram, and mean solar second are taken as the fundamental units. — Syn. Primary, first, leading, original, essential, indispensable, necessary, requisite, important.

II. n. 1. A leading or primary principle, rule, law, or article, which serves as the groundwork of a system; an essential part; as, the fundamentals of the Christian faith.

For the laws of England (though by our charter we are not bound to them, yet) our fundamentals are framed according to them. Winthrop Hist. New England, ii. 33.

High speculations are as barren as the tops of clouds; but the fundamentals of Christianity are fruitful as the valleys or the creeping vine.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1850), i. 68.

Their fundamental law, that all diseases arise from repetition. Smith, Quin's Travels, iv. 6.

2. In music: (a) The root of a chord. (b) The generator of a series of harmonics. Also called fundamental bass, note, or tone.

fundamentality (fun-da-men-tal'i-ty), n. The state or quality of being fundamental; essentiality.

When he finds antiquity and universality combined with fundamentality, the conclusion is inevitable, and in proportion as he finds the evidence of each of those three conditions is it plainly legitimate.

Gladstone, Church and State, vii.

fundamentally (fun-da-men'tal-i), adv. In a fundamental manner; primarily; originally; essentially; at the foundation; as regards fundamentals.

Fundamentally defective. See defective, 1. — That which fundamentally distinguishes the slave is that he labours under restriction to satisfy another's desires. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 34.

fundamentality (fun-da-men'tal-i-ty), n. Fundamentality.

fundation (fun-da'shon), n. [< L. fundatio(n-), foundation; see foundation.] The act of founding or providing.

The first whereof is the fundation of dowrie (viz. two hundred denarii). Pan. box Pilgrimage, p. 215.

fundatrix, n. [< ML. fundatrix, fem. of fundator, a founder; see founder.] A foundress.

The fundatrix purpose was wondrous goodly, her fact was goodly.

Sp. Lillies, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc. 1853), ii. 371.

funded (fun'ded), a. [< fund, v. t. + -ed.] 1. Existing in the form of bonds bearing regular interest; constituting or forming part of the permanent debt of a government or corporation at a fixed rate of interest; as, a funded debt. See debt and fund, v. t.

On the 31st of December, 1897, the public debt of Great Britain funded and unfunded amounted to £21,055,762 13s. 4 1/2 d. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, v. 3.

The nation had an enormous funded debt and a depreciated currency.

G. S. Merriam, 8. Bowles, i. 86.

2. Invested in public funds; as, funded money.

funder (fun'der), n. 1. One who is in favor of funding a debt or debts, or of providing a sinking-fund for the gradual extinction of debt. Specifically — 2. In U. S. politics, from about 1878 onward, a Virginian who was in favor of funding and paying the entire debt of the State (less the quota properly falling upon West Virginia), in distinction from a so-called readjuster, who advocated the repudiation of a part of the debt.

fund-holder (fund'hôl'der), n. An owner of government stock or public securities.

Would you tax the property of the fund holder? No, no minister has yet been either blind or abandoned enough to attempt it.

For, Speech on the Assessed Tax Bill, Dec. 14, 1797.

Tax on fundholders, in respect of profits arising from annuities payable out of any public revenue.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, iii. 111.

fundi (fun'di), n. [Native African.] A kind of grain allied to millet (the Paspalum erio), much cultivated in the west of Africa. It is light and nutritious, and has been recommended for cultivation as food for invalids. Also called funding and hungry rice.

funding (fun'ding), n. [Verbal n. of fund, v. t.] The act or process of converting a floating debt into a funded debt. See fund, v. t., and debt. — Funding system, a system or scheme for funding, usually including a sinking fund for the payment of principal, and a pledge of specific portions of the income of the state or company for the payment of interest meanwhile. See fund, v. t.

The funding system, they say, is in favor of the moneyed interest — oppressive to the land; that is, favorable to us, hard on them.

Ames, Works, i. 104.

fundless (fund'les), a. [< fund, v. t. + -less.] Without funds.

fund-monger (fund'mung'ger), n. An operator or speculator in the public funds. [Rare.]

Importing that the present civil war has been got up by jobbers, swindlers, and fundmongers.

New York Tribune, June 12, 1862.

fund-mongering (fund'mung'ger-ing), n. The act or practice of operating or speculating in the public funds. [Rare.]

Thoroughly imbued with hostility to perpetual debts and fund mongering.

A. A. Rev., CXLIII. 210.

Fundulina (fun-du-lī'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Fundulus + -ina.] In Günther's ichthyological system, a subgroup of Cyprinodontidae carnivorae, in which the anal fin of the male is not modified into an intromittent organ, and all the teeth are pointed. It includes the subfamily Fundulina and other cyprinodonts.

Fundulina (fun-du-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Fundulus + -ina.] A subfamily of Cyprinodontidae, typified by the genus Fundulus, comprising cyprinodont fishes with dentary bones normally united, a short intestinal canal, teeth fixed and pointed, and the anal fin of the male not provided with a rigid intromittent organ. About 30 species inhabit fresh, brackish, and salt waters of the United States; they are known as kiltfishes, minnow-myskies, minnows, etc.

funduline (fun-du-līn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Fundulina.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Fundulina.

Fundulus (fun'du-lus), n. [NL., < L. fundus, bottom; see fund.] A genus of killifishes, of the family Cyprinodontidae, containing numerous species of active habits and very tenacious of life, of no economic value. The commonest North American species is F. heteroclitus; a larger one is known as F. nuptialis. See cut under minnow-myskies.

fundungi (fun-dung'i), n. Same as funds.

fundus (fun'dus), n. [L., the bottom, base; see fund.] 1. In a general sense, bottom; depth; as, the fundus of a cave or a wood.

Prolonged work with the microscope will cause the images seen in its focus to "live in the fundus of the eye," so that, after several hours, shutting the eyes will cause these images to reappear with great distinctness.

G. P. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 549.

2. In anat., the larger end of any cone- or pear-shaped organ, as the upper part of the uterus, the left portion of the stomach, or the anterior and lower end of the gall-bladder. — Fundus glands, the cardiac glands of the stomach. — Fundus of the bladder, the lower part or base. — Fundus of the eye, the back part of the eye, as seen through the pupil in an ophthalmoscopic examination. — Fundus of the stomach, the left, larger end. — Fundus of the uterus, the upper part.

funerary (fū-nē-ri-āl), a. Same as funerary.

Dr. Parr of Camo will preach'd a most pathetic funeral discourse and panegyric at the interment of our late pastor.

Evings, Diary, Feb. 20, 1872.

funerality (fū-nē-ri-āl), a. [As F. funebre = Sp. funebre = Pg. It. funebre; < L. funebria, of or belonging to a funeral (< funus (funer-), a funeral; see funeral), + -al.] Pertaining to funerals; funeral; funereal.

One of these crowns or garlands is most artificially wrought in filagree work with gold and silver wire, in resemblance of myrtle (with which plants the funerary garlands of the ancients were composed).

Sir T. Browne, Misc. Tracts, p. 29.

funerary (fū-nē-rī-ā), a. Same as funerary.

funeral (fū-nē-rāl), a. and n. [a. < ME. funeral, < OF. funeral, funeral = Sp. Pg. funeral = It. funerale, < ML. funeralis, belonging to a burial (the l. adj. was funerius), < L. funus (funer-), a funeral procession, funeral rites, burial, funeral; usually with reference to the burning of the body (whereas exequiae, E. exequies, had reference to the procession), and so prob. from the same root as fumus, smoke; see fume. II. n. < ME. funeral = F. funérailles, pl., = Pr. funerarius = Sp. funeral, also pl. funeralis, funerarius = Pg. funeral = It. funerale, n., < ML. pl. funeralia, funeral rites, funeral, neut. pl. of funeralis; see I.] I. a. Pertaining to burial or sepulture; used, spoken, etc., at the interment of the dead: as, a funeral torch; funeral rites; a funeral train or procession; a funeral oration.

The tyr of funeral service.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2084.

All the sad sayings of Scripture, or the threatenings of the funeral prophets.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. l.

The very term funeral feast is, indeed, a kind of paradox; yet funeral feasts have existed among all nations.

Keary, Prim. Belief, p. 384.

Funeral pile, a heap of wood and other combustible material upon which a dead body is laid to be burned to ashes, a pyre.

Its principal use [that of asbestos], according to Pliny, was for the making of shrouds for royal funerals, to wrap up the corpse so as the ashes might be preserved distinct from that of the wood whereof the funeral pile was composed.

Cambridge, The Scribleriad, iv.

II. n. 1. The ceremony of burying a dead person; the solemnization of interment; obsequies: formerly used also in the plural.

A tyr, in which thofee [the office]

Of funeral he might at accomplie.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2000.

Before he had seen performed his Father's Funerals, which was not till the 27th of October following, he entered into a Treaty of his own Nuptials.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 105.

The funerals of a deceased friend are not only performed at his first interring, but in the monthly minds and anniversary commemorations.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), l. 308.

When they buried him, the little port

Had seldom seen a costlier funeral

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. A procession of persons attending the burial of the dead; a funeral train.

A funeral, with plumes and lights,

And music, went to Camelot

Tennyson, Lady of Shalott.

3. A funeral sermon: usually in the plural.

Darwin.

In the absence of Dr. Humphreys, designed for that service, Mr. Olles Laurence preached his funeral.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., ix. iii. 2.

I could learn little from the minister which preached his funeral.

Fuller, Worthies, Hereford, l. 454.

funeral-ale (fū-nē-rāl-āl), n. [Equiv. to Norw. gravaröl, gravöl = Dan. gravöl = Sw. gravöl, lit. 'grave-ale.'] A funeral feast; a wake; with reference to ancient Scandinavian customs. See ale, 2.

It is far more likely, as Munch supposes, that the ale was made at his [Harold Godwinson's] father's funeral ale, for it is expressly said that at Hadrath his hair had been uncut for ten years, and that space of time had then passed since his father's death.

Edinburgh Rev.

funerally (fū-nē-rāl-ī), adv. In a funeral manner; by way of a funeral.

Even crows were funerally burnt.

Sir T. Browne, Ur. burial, l.

funerary (fū-nē-rāl-ī), a. [= F. funéraire = Sp. funerario, < LL. funerarius, < L. funus (funer-), a funeral; see funeral.] Relating or pertaining to a funeral or burial.

The two [caskets] to the left are in blue glass, inscribed with short funerary legends. Harper's Mag., LV. 201.

funeratus (fū-nē-rāt), v. t. [L. funeratus, pp. of funerare, bury with funeral rites, < funus, (funer-), funeral rites; see funeral, a.] To bury with funeral rites. Cockeram.

funeration (fū-nē-rā-shon), n. [= OF. funeration, < LL. funeratio, < L. funerare, bury with funeral rites. see funerale.] Solemnization of funeral rites.

In the rites of funeration they did use to anoint the dead body with aromatic spices and ointments before they buried them. And so was it the Jewish custom to perform their funerals.

Knatchbull, Annot. on New Testament, p. 41.

funereal (fū-nē-rē-āl), a. [As Sp. funereo = Pg. It. funereo; < L. funerous, of or belonging to a funeral (< funus (funer-), a funeral; see funeral), + -al.] Characteristic of or suitable for a funeral; hence, mournful; dismal; lugubrious; gloomy.

Horneck's fierce eye, and Roome a funereal frown.

Pope, Dunciad, iii. 162.

Dark, funereal barges like my own had flitted by, and the gondoliers had warned each other at every turning with hoarse, lugubrious cries. Howells, Venetian Life, II.

funereally (fū-nē-rē-āl-ī), adv. In a funereal manner; mournfully; dismally.

funest (fū-nēst'), a. [= F. funeste = Sp. Pg. It. funesto, < L. funestus, causing death, destruction, or calamity, deadly, destructive, calamitous, < funus (funer-), a funeral, a dead body, death, etc.; see funeral.] Causing or boding death; ill-boding; hence, lamentable; mournful: as, "funest and direful deaths," Coleridge. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Frequent mischiefs and funest accidents they [mushrooms] have produced, not only to particular persons, but to whole families.

Erben, Acetaria, xxxix.

I perfectly apprehend the funest and calamitous issue which a few days may produce.

Keble, To Sir William Coventry.

fung, feng (fung), n. See fung-huang.

fungaceous (fung-gā'shius), a. [L. fungus + -aceus.] Pertaining or relating to fungi.

fungal (fung-gāl), a. and n. [NL. fungalis, < fungus, fungus; see fungus.] I. a. In bot., pertaining to or characteristic of a fungus or fungi; consisting of the Fungi or fungous plants: as, fungal growth; Lindley's fungal alliance.

Assuming the filaments to be of undoubted fungal origin.

Quinn, Med. Dict., p. 623.

These filament fungal elements are called by phoe.

Goebel, Outline Class. and Spectal Morph., p. 81.

II. n. A fungus.

Fungales (fung-gā'lēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of fungalis; see fungus.] Same as Fungi. Lindley.

fungate (fung-gāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. fungated, ppr. fungating. [L. fungus + -ate.] In pathol., to grow up rapidly in forms suggesting some of the larger fungi: said of morbid growths.

funget, n. [L. fungus, a mushroom, fungus, a soft-headed fellow, a dolt; see fungus.] A blockhead; a dolt.

They are mad, empty vessels, funges, beadle themselves, derided.

Barton, Anat. of Mel., p. 184.

fung-huang, feng-huang (fung'hwāng'), n. [Chinese.] In Chinese myth., a fabulous bird of good omen said to appear when a sage is about to ascend the throne, or when right principles are about to triumph throughout the empire. It is usually called the Chinese phoenix, but seems, from the descriptions of it found in books, to resemble the Argus pheasant. It has not appeared since the days of Confucius. It is frequently represented on Chinese and Japanese porcelain and other works of art. Fung is the name of the male bird, and hwang of the female.

The fung hwang of Chinese legends is a sort of phoenix, adorned with every color, and combining in its form and motions whatever is elegant and graceful, as well as possessing such a benevolent disposition that it will not peck or injure living insects, nor tread on growing herbs.

S. W. Williams, Middle Kingdom, l. 206.

Fungi (fun'ji), n. pl. [L., pl. of fungus, a mushroom; see fungus.] One of the lowest of the great groups of cellular cryptogams. The Fungi are chiefly distinguished by the absence of chlorophyll, and therefore by the lack of power to assimilate inorganic substances, being thus dependent for their food upon living or dead organic matter obtained from other plants or from animals. Consequently, also, they do not inhale carbonic acid and give off oxygen as chlorophyllous plants do in assimilation, but do inhale oxygen and give off carbonic acid as other plants do in respiration. The vegetative system consists of filiform cells, called hyphae, and the hyphae of a fungus taken collectively are called the mycelium. The hyphae are usually septate and branched. In some fungi, as Peronosporae and their allies, there are no septa except those which divide off the propagative cells or organs. Exceptions to the hyphal plan of structure occur in several cases. In the yeast fungi and yeast like stages of certain other fungi the plant consists of a succession of ellipsoid cells formed by budding, in the Chytridiaceae certain species have no mycelium but consist of a spherical or ovoid cell; in the bacteria the prevailing form is that of very minute spheres or rods, which multiply by fission, in the vegetative stage of the Mycogonaceae there is only a mass of protoplasm. If mycelium is said to be absent, it is because the hyphae are separate, or at most only loosely interwoven, as in the common mould, membranous when the hyphae are so interwoven as to form a layer, fibrous when the hyphae form branching strands, the latter being often of considerable size and undulated. In some groups, as the mushrooms, the interwoven hyphae form a compound fungus-body of definite and regular shape. Fungi are soprophytic or parasitic, according as that from which they obtain their food is a dead organic substance or a living organism. Some parasitic species are facultative saprophytes, and some saprophytic species are facultative parasites. Among the saprophytic fungi are the common domestic molds and mildews, the "dry-rot" fungi, the greater number of acromycetous and basidiomycetous fungi, which grow on dead wood, leaves, etc., or organic matter in the soil, also many Hyphomycetes, and the Myxomycetes. Among the parasitic fungi are the Uredinales or rusts and Ustilaginae or smuts, which grow upon wild and cultivated plants, also most Peronosporae, as represented by the potato rot and American grape-vine mildew. Among the Ascomycetes, the Erysiphaceae (powdery mildews) are all parasitic, as are also many other Pyrenomycetes and a few Discomycetes. Many parasitic species, especially the rusts, smuts, and mildews, cause great destruction to cultivated crops. The lichens are now considered by many botanists to consist of fungi parasitic upon algae (the gonidia). (See Lichen.) A few fungi grow upon living animals and man. Several species of Aspergillus cause a disease (otomycosis) of the human ear. Other fungi produce the skin-diseases tinea and ringworm. Bacteria are believed to cause most or all of the fevers and contagious diseases of man and the lower animals. Species of Saprolegnia cause epidemics among fishes, especially the salmon. The principal parasites upon insects belong to the Entomophthoraceae and the genus Cordyceps. (See cut under Cordyceps.) Silkworms are attacked by a species of Botrytis, and bacteria cause epidemics among silkworms and other insects. Both sexual and asexual reproduction occur in fungi; the latter is present in all, and in many is the only kind that has been observed. The asexual spores (conidia) are most frequently produced upon the tips of unbranched hyphae, as in Hyphomycetes, or on short hyphae produced in conceptacles, but sometimes by free cell-formation, as in Mucor. The sexual organs are of three types. In the conjugating fungi, Mucor and its allies, reproduction takes place by the union of two similar cells to form a zygospore. In Peronospora and its allies oogonia and antheridia are formed; the antheridium comes in direct contact with the oogonium, and a transfer of the protoplasm into the oosphere takes place. In the Ascomycetes, so far as known, a carpogonium takes the place of the oogonium, and the product of fertilization is usually a perithecium or apothecium containing asci and spores. (See Eurotium.) Modern classifications of fungi are of two kinds. That proposed by F. Cohn in 1872 classes together in primary groups fungi and algae having similar modes of reproduction, employing the peculiar fungal characters in distinguishing the secondary groups; but the usual method recognizes fungi as wholly distinct from algae, separated by physiological and morphological characters, in this respect agreeing with the old method. The artificial system formerly in use and still retained in some English books divides the fungi into the orders Ascomycetes, Phycomycetes, Hyphomycetes, Coniomyces, Gasteromycetes, and Hymenomycetes. De Bary in 1881 made four divisions: Phycomycetes, Hyphomycetes, Basidiomycetes, and Ascomycetes. Goebel (1882) does not include Myxomycetes and Schizomycetes with Fungi proper, the latter he divides into Chytridiaceae, Ustilaginae, Phycomycetes, Ascomycetes, Uredinales, and Basidiomycetes. The Fungi Imperfecti of modern authors include a large number of forms, of which some are known, and most are suspected, to be the asexual stages of Ascomycetes. The principal groups of Fungi Imperfecti are the Sphaeropodae, Melanconiae, and Hyphomycetes. The number of known species of fungi is estimated at about 30,000. Most of the edible fungi are found among the mushrooms and puffballs; but the truffle and morel are ascomycetous. Most of the species recognized as poisonous are mushrooms; but the ergot-fungus is ascomycetous. Some snails are poisonous to cattle. Some fungi produce poisonous substances, as alcohol, by fermentation. Also called Fungales. See cut under ascus, bandium, clavaria, ergot, aspergillum, Fusellidium, and Puccinia.

Fungia (fun'ji-gā), n. [NL. < L. fungus, a mushroom; see fungus.] The typical genus of mushroom-corals of the family Fungiidae. Lamarck, 1801. See cut under coral.

Fungia . . . is the largest of the solitary lime-secreting corals, and often reaches a diameter of from six to eight inches. It is disk-shaped, with a large number of radiating partitions which extend from the center to a periphery not bounded by a vertical wall. The tentacles . . . are irregularly disposed over its whole upper surface. Fungia in its adult condition is not attached to the ground, but lies in the coral lagoons in rather sheltered places.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 117.

fungible (fun'ji-bl), a. and n. [L. fungibilis, < L. fungi, perform, discharge; see function.] I. a. Capable of being replaced by another in respect of function, office, or use.

The theologians based themselves on the glossators and legists, and the wordy strife about fungible and "consumptible" things continued for several centuries, until finally settled by Salmasius, Turgot, and Bentham. Science, VII. 378.

II. n. In the civil law, a thing of such a nature that it may be replaced by another of equal quantity and quality; a movable which may be estimated by weight, number, of measure, as grain or money.

fungic (fun'jik), a. [= F. fungique; as fungus + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from fungi.

fungicide (fun'ji-sid), n. [L. fungus, fungus, + -cidus, a killer, < cadere, kill.] That which destroys fungi; specifically, a chemical applied to fungi or their germs for the purpose of destroying them; a germicide.

Fungicolæ (fun-jik'ō-lē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of fungicola; see fungicolous.] 1. In Latreille's system, the first family of Coleoptera trimera, now retained as a superfamily of trimerous or cryptotetramerous coleopterans, with filiform maxillary palpi, and moderately long flattened or clavate antennae: represented by such families as the Endomychidae or fungus-beetles. See cut under Endomychus.—2. A group of dipterous insects or fungus-gnats.

fungicolous (fun-jik'ō-lus), a. [< NL. fungicola, < L. fungus, mushroom, + colere, inhabit.] Living in or upon fungi; specifically, of or pertaining to the Fungicola.

Fungida (fun'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Fungus + -ida.] Same as Fungidae.

fungiform (fun'ji-fōrm), a. [< L. fungus, a mushroom, + forma, form.] Having the form of a mushroom; cylindrical with a broader convex head: specifically applied to certain papillae of the tongue, distinguished from filiform and circumvallatæ. Also fungiliform. See papilla.

The nerve-fibres are more readily seen, however, in the fungiform papillae of the tongue.

W. H. Carpenter, Micros., § 482.

fungid (fun'ji-id), n. A mushroom-coral, as a member of the Fungidae.

Fungidae (fun'ji-i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Fungia + -idae.] A family of epore scleroderminous stone-corals, the mushroom-corals, so called because of their usual shape as large flat cups. They are without thecae, but with many well-developed dentate septa connected by synaptulae. Also Fungidæ. See Fungia, and cut under coral. J. D. Dana, 1846.

Fungine (fun'ji-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Fungia + -ina.] A subfamily of Fungidae. Also Funginae. Edwards and Hume, 1849.

fungilliform (fun'ji-i-fōrm), a. [*< NL. as if fungillus, dim. of L. fungus, a mushroom, + forma, form.] Same as fungiform.

fungin, fungine (fun'jin), n. [< fungus + -in, -ine.] Same as fungus-cellulose.

In 1866 De Bary gave this name (fungus cellulose) to the substance composing the cell walls of fungi. Since then, the names fungine and metacellulose have been given to this doubtful substance.

Poulsen, Bot. Micro Chem. (trans.), p. 79.

funginous (fun'ji-nus), a. [< fungus + -inus + -ous.] Of or belonging to a fungus.

fungite (fun'jit), n. [< fungus + -ite.] A kind of fossil coral.

Fungivora (fun-jiv'ō-rē), n. pl. [NL. < see fungivorous.] A group of fungivorous dipterous insects.

fungivorous (fun-jiv'ō-rus), a. [< L. fungus, mushroom, + vorare, devour.] Feeding upon fungi: applied to many insects.

fungoid (fung'oid), a. [< L. fungus, mushroom, + (tr.) -oides, form.] 1. Having the appearance or character of a fungus; hence, sporadic.

"The seed of immortality has sprouted within me—Only a fungoid growth, I dare say—a crowding disease in the lungs," said Deronda.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxxvii.

2. In pathol., characterized by morbid growths resembling a fungus, especially those of a malignant character: as, a fungoid disease.

fungologist (fung-gol'ō-jist), n. [< fungology + -ist.] One engaged in the study of fungology; a mycologist.

fungology (fung-gol'ō-jī), n. [< L. fungus, mushroom (see fungus), + (tr.) -logia, < (tr.) -logos, speak: see -ology.] The science which deals with fungi. More commonly called mycology.

fungosity (fung-gos'i-tī), n. [= F. fungositas = Sp. fungosidad = It. fungosità; as fungous + -ity.] 1. The quality of being fungous; also, a fungous excrecence.

Eggs cast into the matrix of the earth, or certain little pustules, or fungosities on its surface.

Biblioth. Bibl. (Oxf., 1720), i. 202.

2. In pathol., proud flesh. Dunglison. fungous (fung'us), a. [< ME. fungous = F. fungueux = Sp. Pg. It. fungoso, < L. fungosus, full of holes, spongy, fungous, < fungus, a mushroom, fungus: see fungus.] 1. Belonging to or having the character of fungi; spongy.

And that is better for him (fishes) theme is doing, For that there's not be right fungous strange.

Palladius, Rusticallia (E. E. T. S.), p. 172.

We may be sure of raine, in case we see a fungous substance or root gathered about bumps and candle snuffs.

Holland, tr. of Piny, xlvii 35.

The sapless wood, directed of the bark, Grows fungous, and takes fire at every spark.

Cooper, Conversation, l. 54.

Another form of fungous vegetation that develops itself within the living body . . . is the Botrytis basiana.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 312.

2. Characterized by the appearance of fungoid growths: as, a fungous disease.—3. Growing or springing up suddenly, but not substantial or durable.

The meager productions of the French and English press, that fungous growth of novels and pamphlets.

Harris, Mercur.

fung-shui, fang-shui (fung'ahwē), n. [(Chinese, < fung, wind, + shui, water.)] A kind of geomancy practised by the Chinese for determining the luckiness or unluckiness of sites for graves, houses, cities, etc.

Burial-places are selected by geomancers, and their location has important results on the prosperity of the living. The supposed connection between these two things has influenced the science, religion, and customs of the Chinese from very early days, and under the name of fung-shui, or "wind and water" rules, still contains most of their science, and explains most of their superstitions.

S. W. Williams, Middle Kingdom, II. 246.

Fung-shui, or "wind-and-water" magic, . . . has of late come under the notice of Europeans from the unexpected impediments it has placed in their way when desirous of building or constructing railways on Chinese soil.

E. H. Tyler, Keyes, Brit., XV. 244.

fungus (fung'us), n.; pl. fungi (fun'ji). [*In earlier use fungo (q. v.); = OF. fungo, a mushroom, F. fungus, fungus (in pathol.) = Sp. Pg. It. fungo, < L. fungus, a mushroom, fungus, for afungus*, < (Gr. αφύγγος, Attic form of αφύγγος, a sponge: see sponge).] 1. A plant belonging to the group Fungi (which see).*

Each with some wondrous gift approach'd the Power, A nest, a toad, a fungus, or a flower.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 400.

In wine-making, the fermentation of the juices of the grapes or other fruit employed is not going by the development of minute fungi whose germs have settled on their skins.

W. H. Carpenter, Micros., § 311.

The healthy animal organism possesses the power of destroying and eliminating certain kinds of living microscopical spores and filaments of fungi from the circulation.

The Lancet, June 4, 1881.

2. In pathol., a spongy morbid excrecence, as proud flesh formed in wounds. Bird's-nest fungus. See bird's-nest. Budding fungi. See budding. Oblique-fungus. See oblique. Filamentous fungus, one composed of separate or but little interwoven hyphae, as the common molds—Fungus disease, mycetozoa. Fungus hematomas, in pathol., a name applied to a soft and vascular carcinoma when, after ulceration of the integuments, it grows up rapidly in a dark colored, rugose, easily bleeding mass. Fungus Mollissima, the Cynomorum coccineum, a fungus like plant of southern Europe, of the apetalous order Balanophoraceae. See cut under Cynomorum. House-fungus, a fungus destructive to the timbers of houses and other buildings—dry rot. Smut-fungus, one of the Ustilaginaceae which produces a smut-like mass of spores. See smut. Spore-fungi, Basidiomycetes (mushrooms, puffballs, etc.) which may be propagated by means of masses of mycelium called spores. Sprouting fungi, those fungi propagated by sprouting or budding, as the species of Saccharomyces and growth forms of certain higher fungi. Yeast-fungus, the fungus which is the active principle in yeast, Saccharomyces. See yeast and fermentation. (See also basileus fungus, fish fungus.)

fungus-beetle (fung'us-bē'tl), n. A fungicolous beetle, as of the family Endomychidae or of the family Erotylidae; an endomychid. See cut under Endomychus and Erotylus.

fungus-cellulose (fung'us-sel'ū-lus), n. The substance which composes the cell walls of fungi, different in chemical reactions from ordinary cellulose. Also called fungin, fungine, and metacellulose.

fungus-foot (fung'us-fū't), n. Mycetozoa.

fungus-gnat (fung'us-gnat), n. A nematoceran dipterous insect of the family Mycetophilidae; so called from the habitat of the larvae. Some seven hundred species of these minute gnats are described.

fungus-midge (fung'us-mij), n. Same as fungus-gnat.

fungus-stone (fung'us-stōn), n. A ball composed of earth and the matted mycelium of Polyporus tuberaster, used, especially in Italy, for the propagation of that fungus. Under proper conditions of temperature and moisture, the fungus grows and fructifies.

fungus-tinder (fung'us-tin'der), n. Tinder made from the fungus Polyporus igniarius; punk.

funic (fu'nik), a. Same as funicular.

funicle (fu'nikl), n. [= F. funiculus = It. funicolo < L. funiculus, dim. of funicus, a rope, a cord: see funiculus.] 1. A small cord; a small ligature; a fiber.—2. In entom., the part of the antenna between the scape and the club. Also funicule.—3. In anat., same as funiculus, § (a).—4. In bot.: (a) The stalk of an ovule or seed. See cut in preceding column. (b) In Nidulariaceae among fungi, a pedicel attaching the peridium to the inner surface of the wall of the peridium. Also funiculus.

funicular (fū-nik'ū-lār), a. and n. [= F. funiculaire = Sp. Pg. It. funicular, < *NL. funicularia, < L. funiculus, a small cord: see funicule.] 1. a. 1. Having the character of a funicle; constituting a funiculus; relating to the hypothesis of a funiculus, or self-contracting ether.—2. In anat., relating or pertaining to the funis umbilicalis: as, the funicular process of the peritoneum. Dunglison. Also funic.—Funicular diagram. See diagram.—Funicular machine, a name given to certain contrivances intended to illustrate some mechanical principle, and consisting mainly of an arrangement of cords and suspended weights.—Funicular polygon, in statics, the figure assumed by a string supported at its extremities and acted on by several pressures.

II. n. The funicular polygon.

Funicularia (fū-nik'ū-lār'i-ā), n. [NL. < see funicular.] Same as Funiculina.

funiculate (fū-nik'ū-lāt), a. [*< NL. funiculatus, < L. funiculus, a small cord: see funicule.] 1. In zool., forming a narrow ridge.—2. In bot., having a funicle.

funicule (fū-ni-kul), n. [< L. funiculus, q. v.] In entom., same as funiculus, §, and funiclo, 2.

funiculi, n. Plural of funiculus.

Funiculina (fū-nik'ū-lī-nā), n. [NL. < L. funiculus + -ina; see funiculus.] A genus of pennatuloid polyps, typical of the family Funiculinidae. Also found in the forms Funicularia, Funiculus.

Funiculinae (fū-nik'ū-lī-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Funiculina + -ina.] A subsection of apicateous pennatuloid polyps, with polyps in distinct rows on both sides of the rachis. Kölliker.

Funiculinidae (fū-nik'ū-lī-nī-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Funiculina + -idae.] A family of pennatuloid polyps without rachial pinnae, with sessile polyps on both sides of the rachis in distinct rows, and with ventral zoidia.

funiculus (fū-nik'ū-lus), n.; pl. funiculi (-li). [*L., a small rope, cord, or line, dim. of funicus, a rope, a cord: see funicus.] 1. A small rope or cord. E. Phillips.—2. In early German land law, a cord or slender rope with which land was measured.—3. In old physics, a self-contracting ether, assumed by some of those who rejected the doctrine of the elasticity of the air.—4. In bot., same as funicle, 4.—5. In anat.: (a) The navel-string or umbilical cord connecting the fetus with the placenta, and so with the parent. Also funis and funicle. (b) One of the smaller bundles of a nerve which are inclosed in a special sheath of neurilemma or perineurium. See nerve.*

The nerves themselves have something of the same oblique structure as striated muscles: that is, a more or less cylindrical fasciculus surrounded by a sheath (epineurium) and the mass in turn being composed of smaller bundles (funiculi), each funiculus having its special sheath (perineurium, neurilemma).

Waller and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 228.

6. In Polyzoa, the gastroparietal band or ligament connecting the alimentary canal with the wall of the endocyst. See cut under Polyzoida.—7. In Myriapoda, a cord connecting the anal end of the embryo with the so-called amnion.—8. In entom., that part of the flagellum of the antenna which is between the pedicel and the club; the funicle; used especially of hymenopterous insects. Also funicule.—9. In Protozoa, specifically, the filament or slender thread which connects the several nodules of a compound endoplast, as the component nitellus masses in such infusorians as Laredus and Lazophyllum. Naville Kent.—10. [cup.] [NL.] Same as Funiculina.—Funiculus cuneatus (wedge-shaped funicle), the column of the oblongata lying next to the funicular gracilla, the upward continuation of the posterior lateral column of the cord.—Funiculus gracill (slender funicle), the longitudinal tract on either side of the posterior mid line of the medulla oblongata, the upward continuation of the posterior median column of the cord.—Funiculus Rolando, the longitudinal prominence on the posterior surface of the medulla oblongata on either side, outside of the cuneate funiculus. It includes the tubercle of Rolando, and is produced by the apposition of the caput cornu posterioris to the surface. Also called lateral cuneate funiculus.—Funiculus solernis, a strand of fibrous tissue piercing the cerebellar opposite the fovea centralia, and connecting its laminae.—Funiculus spermaticus, the spermatic cord (which see, under cord).—Funiculus teres (round funicle), a longitudinal eminence on either side of the median line of the floor of the fourth ventricle of the brain. Also called eminencia teres.—Funiculus umbilicalis, the umbilical cord (which see, under cord).

As a yoke it was fork-shaped the bow being placed over the neck of the offender, whose arms were tied to the arms, and it was thus carried about by the person upon whom it was inflicted. In another form it served as a post to which persons were bound to be scourged, and in a larger form, sometimes with two uprights connected by a cross piece, it was a gallows on which criminals were hanged, or a cross upon which they were bound or nailed.

They shall escape the furca and the wheel, the torments of lustful persons, and the crown of flames that is reserved for the ambitious. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 690.

2. In zoological classifications, divergence in two lines from the point representing a given group; dichotomy, considered in the abstract.

furcate (fēr'kāt), a. [L. furcatus, < ML. furca, a fork: see fork.] Forked; branching like the prongs of a fork. — Furcate antennae, in entom., those antennae which are divided from the base into two branches, as in certain Trichodinae, etc.

furcate (fēr'kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. furcated, ppr. furcating. [L. furcatus: see furcate, a.] To branch; fork; divide into branches.

furcately (fēr'kāt-ē), adv. In a furcate or forked manner or condition.

furcation (fēr-ka'shun), n. [L. furcata + -ion.] A forking; a branching like the tines of a fork; also, that which branches off; a division.

But when they grow old, they grow less branched, and first do lose their brow antlers, or lowest furcations next the head.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 9.

furcatorium (fēr-kā-tō-ri-um), n.; pl. furcatoria (-ā). [NL., noun, of furcatorius*, < ML. furcatus, forked: see furcate, a.] The furciform bone, wishbone, or merrythought of a fowl: more fully called os furcatorium. See cut under furcula.

furcellate (fēr-sel'āt), a. [L., as if furcella*, equiv. to furcula, a little fork (cf. furcellatus, forked), dim. of furca, fork: see fork. Cf. furcate.] Slightly furcate.

furche (fēr'shā), a. In her., same as fourchéd.

Furcifer (fēr'si-fēr), n. [NL., < L. furcifer, a yoke-bearer: see furciferous.] 1. A genus of South American deer, so called from the furcate antlers, which have a simple beam and a brow-antler. F. chilensis and F. antioquiensis are examples; they are called genital deer. — 2. A genus of reptiles. Fitzinger.

Genital Deer (Furcifer Antennae)

furciferous (fēr-si-fēr-ūs), a. [L. furcifer, bearing a fork or yoke, a yoke-bearer (much used as a term of vituperation, usually of slaves, equiv. to "rascal," "gallows-bird"). < furca, a fork, also an instrument of punishment in the form of a fork (see furca, 1), & ferre = *E. bear*¹.] 1. In entom., bearing a forked appendage or organ. Applied to certain lepidopterous larvae which have, on the first segment behind the head, a forked tube, called the ameteria, or scent-organ, from which the insect can protrude slender threads, for the purpose, it is supposed, of frightening away its enemies.

2. Rascally; scoundrelly; villainous. De Quincey. [Rare.]

furciform (fēr'si-fōrm), a. [L. furca, a fork, + forma, shape.] Shaped like a fork: as, the furciform clavicles or merrythought of a fowl.

Furcraea (fēr-krē'ā), n. [NL., named after A. F. de Fourcroy, a French chemist (1755-1809).] A genus of amaryllidaceous plants closely related to Agave, and resembling that genus in slow growth, thick fleshy leaves, and tall, pyramidal terminal inflorescence. There are about 15 species, of tropical America, some of which are extensively naturalized in the old world, and some are cultivated for ornament. Also written Fourcroya.

furcula (fēr'kū-lā), n.; pl. furculae (-ā). [L., a forked prop to support a wall when undermined, dim. of furca, a fork: see fork.] 1. In ornith., the united pair of clavicles of a bird, forming a single forked bone, whence the name. The prongs of the furcula commonly meet at an approximately acute angle, like a V, and there develop a process called the hypocleidum; the extremities pass to each shoulder-joint. Sometimes the prongs meet at an open angle, like a U, and they may be unlocked with the keel of the sternum. The furcula serves to keep the shoulders apart, and is strongest, with most open times, in birds of the greatest powers of flight. It is occasionally rudimentary or defective, the clavicles being separate and very small, as occurs especially in some flightless birds. The furcula of the common fowl is familiar as the scapular or wishbone. Also called furculum (with plural furculae).

2. In entom., a forked process: specifically applied to a long bifid process on the bodies of certain caterpillars. See furciferous, 1.

furcular (fēr'ku-lar), a. [< furcula + -ar.] Shaped like a fork; furcate: as, the furcular bone of a fowl.

Furcularia (fēr-kū-lā-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL., nout. pl. of 'furcularis', < L. furcula, dim. of furca, a fork; see furcula, furcular.] A name applied by Lamarck to the Kotifera properly so called.

furculum (fēr'ku-lum), n.; pl. furcula (-lā). [L.: see furcula.] Same as furcula, 1.

furder (fēr'dēr), adv., a., and v. An obsolete or dialectal form of furth.

furdler (fēr'dl), v. t. [The older form of furl, for furdle, furdol, pack up, hence furl: see furl, furdol.] To furl; roll up.

The colours furdled up, the drum is mute.

John Taylor, Works (1839).

Nor to urge the thwart enclosure and furling of flowers.
Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, III. § 16.

furfur (fēr'fēr), n.; pl. furfures (-bz). [L., bran, also seurf or scales on the skin.] In pathol., dandruff; seurf; porrigo; in the plural, scales like bran, as of the skin.

furfuraceous (fēr-fū-rā'shi-us), a. [= F. furfuraceus = Pg. It. furfuraceo, < LL. furfuraceus, like bran, < L. furfur, bran; see furfur.] 1. Made of or resembling bran. Also furfurous.—2. Scaly; scurfy. Specifically applied in pathology to forms of desquamation in which the epidermis comes off in scales, and to a bran-like sediment which is sometimes observed in urine.

3. In bot., coated with bran-like particles; scurfy. Also applied to the thallus of a lichen when gonidia are developed in such a way as to produce granules or wart-like on the surface.

furfuraceously (fēr-fū-rā'shi-us-lī), adv. In a furfuraceous or scaly manner; with furfur.

furfuramide (fēr'fēr-am'id or -id), n. [< furfur + -amide.] In chem., a crystalline solid ($C_{12}H_{12}N_2O_8$) produced by the action of ammonia on furfural.

furfuration (fēr-fū-rā'shun), n. [< furfur + -ation.] The falling of scurf or scurfy scales.

furfures, n. Plural of furfur.

furfural (fēr'fēr-ol), n. [< L. furfur, bran, + -ol.] In chem., a volatile oil ($C_8H_6O_3$) obtained when wheat-bran, sugar, or starch is acted on by dilute sulphuric acid. It is colorless when first prepared, but turns brown when exposed to the air, and forms a tarry mass. It has a fragrant odor resembling that of bitter almonds, and has the chemical properties of aldehyde.

furfurous (fēr'fū-rus), a. [< L. furfuraceus, like bran, < furfur, bran.] Same as furfuraceous, 1; as, "furfurous bread." Sydney Smith.

Furia (fū-rī-ā), n. [L., a Fury; see fury.] 1. A Linnæan genus of Vermes.—2. A genus of South American bats, of the family Emballonuridae, having the forehead prominent, the tail ending in the intermembral membrane, and the following dental formula: incisors and premolars 2 in each upper and 3 in each lower half-jaw, canines 1 in each, and molars 3 in each upper and lower half-jaw. There is but one species, F. horrea. F. Cuvier, 1828.

Furiae (fū-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Furia.] One of four divisions of bats, of the family Emballonuridae, containing the genera Furia and Amorphaechilus.

furial, a. [ME. furyalle = Sp. Pg. furial = It. furiale, < L. furialis, furious, belonging to the Furies, < furia, fury; see fury.] Furious; raging; tormenting.

What is the cause, if it be for to telle,
That ye be in this furial pyne of helle?

Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 440.

furibund (fū-rī-bund), a. [= F. furibond = Sp. Pg. furibundo = It. furibondo, < L. furibundus, furious, < furere, be mad; see fury.] Furious; raging; mad. [Rare.]

Poor Lambton Chabray has a quarter round her neck, and furibund Amazons at each end.

Carlyle, French Rev., I. vii. 7.

furibundant (fū-rī-bun'dant), a. [< furibund + -ant.] Same as furibund.

Is it possible for pulling wench to tame
The furibundant champion of fame? G. Harvey.

furiosant (fū-rī-ō'sant), a. [Heraldic F.; as furiosus + -ant.] Raging; an epithet applied in heraldry to the bull, bugle, and other animals when depicted in a rage or in madness. Also runant.

furiosity (fū-rī-ōs'i-ti), n. [= Pg. furiosidade = It. furiosità; as furiosus + -ity.] The state of being furious; raging madness. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

furioso (fū-rī-ō'sō), a. and n. [It., furiosus, < L. furiosus, furious; see furious.] 1. a. Furious; vehement; used in music.

II. n. A violent, raging, furious person.

A violent man and a furioso was dead to this.
Sp. Hackel, Abp. Williams, II. 218.

furious (fū-rī-us), a. [< ME. furiosus = F. furiosus = Pr. furios = Sp. Pg. It. furioso, < L. furiosus, full of madness or rage, raging, furious, < furia, madness, fury; see fury.] 1. Full of fury; transported with passion; raging; violent: as, a furious animal.

He lokyd furjous as a wyld catt.

None Poet (ed. Wright), p. 2.

The Sultans have often been compelled to propitiate the furious rabble of Constantinople with the head of an unpopular Vizier.

Macaulay, Macchiavelli.

2. Mad; frenzied; insane.

No man did ever think the hurtful actions of furious men and innocents to be punishable.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

3. Marked by fury or impetuosity; impelled by or moving with violence; vehement; boisterous: as, a furious blow; a furious wind or storm.

A furious pass the spear of Ajax made Through the broad shield, but at the corselet stay'd.

Pope, Iliad, xiii. 806.

But so the furious blast prevail'd,

That, pitiless perforce,

They left their outcast mate behind

Copier, The Cast-away.

—Syn. Impetuous, fierce, frantic, tumultuous, turbulent, tempestuous, stormy, angry.

furiously (fū-rī-us-lī), adv. In a furious manner; with impetuous motion or agitation; violently; vehemently: as, to run furiously; to attack one furiously.

The driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi; for he driveth furiously.

2 Ki. ix. 20.

The pendulum swung furiously to the left, because it had been drawn too far to the right.

Macaulay, Sir James Mackintosh.

furiosness (fū-rī-us-ness), n. The state of being furious; violent agitation; impetuous motion; madness; frenzy; rage.

Then shall stretch the forth thyne hande vpo the furjousnes of mine enemies, and thy right hande shall smite me.

Bible of 1551, Ps. cxxviii. 7.

furl (fēr'l), v. t. [A contr. of furdle. see furdle, and cf. furdle, furl.] 1. To wrap or roll, as a sail, close to the yard, stay, or mast, and fasten by a gasket or cord; draw up or draw into close compass, as a flag.

Along the coast he shoots with swelling gales,
Then lowers the lofty mast, and furls the sails.

Pickell, Iliad, I.

Till the war-drums throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were furled.

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

2. To ruffle.

Disheaving, furl'd his mane and tore the ground,
His eyes embracing all the desert round.

Dryden, Abs. and Achit.

To furl a topsail in a body (used), to gather all the lower parts of the topsail into the hant about the topmast.

furlano (fūr-lā-nō), n. Same as furlant.

furling-line (fēr'ling-līn), n. Naut., a line wound spirally about a sail and its yard in tacking. Also called sea-gasket.

furlong (fēr'lōng), n. [< ME. furlong, furlang, furlong, forlang, etc., < AS. furlang (once improp. furlang), a furlong (used to translate L.

stadium), prop. the length of a furrow, or the drive of the plow before it is turned, < fwrh, a furrow, + lang, long. The length of a furrow would ordinarily be equiv. to the length of the field; like other orig. indefinite terms of measure, the word came to have a definite value, being fixed by custom at 40 rods, and hence called in ML. (AL.) quarrentena: see quarrentine.] A measure of length equal to the eighth part of a mile, 40 rods, poles, or perches, 220 yards, or 201.17 meters. The furlong corresponds to the Roman stadium, and one eighth of any kind of mile is called a furlong in older writers. Thus, English writers of the sixteenth century often call 62½ feet a furlong; and the reason is that 5 feet was taken to be a pace, so that a Roman mile of 1,000 paces would be 8 × 62½ feet. So the eighth part of a Scotch mile, or nearly 742 feet, was a furlong. In the English translation of the New Testament furlong is used to translate the Greek stadion, stadium. Abbreviated fug.

Ac Ich can fynde in a felde and in a forlōng an hare,
An holden a knyghtes court and a counte with the reyne.

Piers Plowman (C), viii. 22.

And although there appears difference in their summes, yet that is imputed rather to the diversity of their furlongs, which some reckoned longer than others, than to their differing opinions.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 48.

A furlong way, a short distance of space or interval of time.

The constable and his wyf also

And Custance than take the ryght way

Toward the see, a furlong way or two.

Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 4.

And shortly up they clomben alle three

They sitten stille, wel a furlong way.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 451.

furlough (fēr'lō), n. [*The spelling furloe occurs in the 18th century, but furlough appears to be the earliest spelling (as in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674). As the spelling furlough does not follow that of the orig. language, it was prob. intended to be phonetic (from a military point of view), the gh perhaps as f and the accent on the second syllable; < D. verlof, leave, furlough, = I.G. verloff = G. dial. verlaub (these prob. of Scand. origin). < Dan. forlor, leave, permission, furlough, leave of absence, = Sw. förlor, leave, pardon; a form (with prefix for-, for = E. for-) equiv. to the older Dan. orlof, leave of absence, furlough, = Sw. orlof, dismission, discharge, = Icel. orlof, leave, = D. orlof, leave, = OHG. MHD. urloup, G. urlaub, leave of absence, furlough, prop. the abstract noun of a verb repr. (approximately) by Icel. orlofa, allow, and by OHG. urlouben, MHD. erloben, G. erlauben = AS. alifan, alifan = Goth. alahban, leave, permit, < Goth. us- (= AS. d- = OHG. ar-, ir-, unaccented; AS. or- = OHG. ur- = Icel. or-, accented) + *lahban (in comp.), leave; see a-1, or-, for-1, and leave-1, v. Furlough thus ult. contains the elements for-1 and leave-1.] Leave of absence; especially, in military use, leave or license given by a commanding officer to an officer or a soldier to be absent from service for a certain time. In the United States army the term is used officially only for such leave given to an enlisted man, the same permission granted to a commissioned officer being designated a leave of absence. A soldier availing himself of the permission is said to be furloughed, or on furlough; an officer, on leave. The word is also used to designate the temporary discharge from service of a civilian in the employ of the government. In the United States navy it has a special significance, indicating the condition of an officer off duty either for fault or at his own request and only receiving one half of "waiting-orders pay."*

After an absence of several years passed with his regiment, . . . he was now returned on a three years' furlough.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 20.

The Secretary of the Navy shall have authority to place on furlough any officer on the active list of the Navy.

Rev. Statutes, U. S., § 1442.

[The power given to the Secretary of the Navy is rarely exercised.]

Officers on furlough shall receive only half of the pay to which they would have been entitled if on leave of absence.

Rev. Statutes, U. S., § 1557.

Capt. Irwin goes by the next packet-boat to Holland; he has got a furlow from his father for a year.

Chesterfield, Misc., IV. xiii.

Some find their natural selves, and only then,
In furloughs of divine escape from men.

Lowell, Agassiz, II. 1.

furlough (fēr'lō), v. t. [< furlough, n.] To furnish with a furlough; grant leave of absence to, as a soldier.

Furloughed men returned in large numbers, and before their "leaves" had terminated. M. A. Rev., CXXVI. 68.

furmenty, furmety, furmity (fēr'men-tī, -mē-tī, -mī-tī), n. Same as furmenty.

And ye shall eate neither bread, nor parched corne, nor furmenty of newe corne, untill the selfe same daye that ye have broughte an offringe unto your God.

Bible of 1551, Lev. xxiii. 14.

In this plight did he leave Moses, resolved in her heart to be the greatest lady in the world, and never after to feed of worse than furnerity. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

His lips may water
Like a puppy's over a furnerity pot.

Massey, Maid of Honour, v. 1.

I hate different diets, and furnerity and butter, and herb porridge.
Swift, To Stella, xlii.

furnetory (fēr'mē-tū-ri), n. Same as frumenty.
fur-moth (fēr'mōth), n. The Tinea pellionella, a kind of moth which infests fur.

furnace (fēr'nās), n. [ME. furnasse, furnays, furna, furnays, fornays, etc.; *OF. fornax, fornaz, fornays, m., fornais, f., F. fournaise = Pr. fornatz, fornus = OSp. fornaz, Sp. hornaza = It. fornace, < L. fornax (fornac-), an oven, furnace, kiln, < fornus, furnus, an oven, connected with fornus, warn.] 1. A structure in which to make and maintain a fire the heat of which is to be used for some mechanical purpose, as the melting of ores or metals, the production of steam as a power, the warming of apartments, the baking of pottery, etc.; specifically, a structure of considerable size built of stone or brick, and usually lined with fire-brick, used for some purpose connected with the operation of smelting metals. Furnaces are constructed in a great variety of ways, according to the different purposes to which they are to be applied. See air-furnace, blast-furnace, and hearth.
There made Nabugodonosor the kyng putte three children in to the Furnace of Fyr, for thei woren in the righte Trouthe of Belieue. Manderville, Travels, p. 35.
As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted. Ezek. xlii. 22.*

2. Figuratively, a place, time, or occasion of severe torture or great trial.
Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction. Isa. xlviii. 10.

Base-burning-furnace. See base-burning.
Bone-black furnace. See bone-black.
Calcing-furnace, a furnace in which the operation of calcing is performed, specifically, a reverberatory furnace, with a low arch, in which hard lead is "softened" by exposing it to the action of the flame, by which the foreign metals (antimony, copper, and iron) are oxidized, and collect on the surface of the metal in the form of dross. Also called improving-furnace, and the process of softening is also called improvement.

Carbonizing-furnace. See carbonize.
Castilian furnace, a circular furnace, usually about 3 feet in diameter and 8½ feet high, having a breast formed by a semicircular iron pan furnished with a lip for running off the slag and a longitudinal slot for convenience in tapping. On the top of this cylinder, which is made of fire-brick, rests a box shaped covering of masonry supported by four pillars, and in this are the feeding-door and the outlet for the products of combustion. The blast is obtained by means of a fan, and there are three tuyers. This furnace is used in Spain for smelting poor ore of lead as well as rich slag. It has also been introduced to a limited extent in England.
Catalan furnace or forge, a furnace used in the French Pyrenees and in some parts of Spain for the manufacture of wrought iron directly from the ore. It consists of a quadrangular hearth, made of some fire-resisting material, supported by one or more small arches, and built against the side of a wall like the ordinary blacksmith's forge. The blast is supplied by a peculiar kind of blowing machine called a trompe, in which the current of air is produced by the falling of water through a vertical tube. See blowery and forge.

Cementation-furnace. See cementation.
Converting-furnace, a form of furnace in which bar-iron is converted into steel by carburization (which see). It consists essentially of an oblong rectangular case, called the chest or pot, open at the top, and inclosed within an arched fire-brick chamber, with arched openings at each end, through which a man can enter. The fireplace is underneath, and that and the flues are so arranged that the chest can be uniformly heated to a high temperature. The whole is inlosed within a hollow cone of brickwork, open at the top, like a glass-furnace. Two such chests are ordinarily built side by side, space being left for flues between the adjacent walls.—Cupola blast-furnace, the modern form of blast-furnace, resembling the cupola used for foundry purposes in being much less massive in construction than the old-fashioned blast-furnace, but at the same time of much greater size, the largest being over 100 feet in height and 25 in diameter across the bosom. The cupola blast-furnace is built of radiating brickwork, inclosed within a wrought iron casing.—Cupola furnace. See cupola-furnace.
Danks rotary furnace, a peculiar form of puddling-furnace (see puddle); in which the chamber in which the puddling is effected is made to rotate during the operation. It is claimed that the Danks furnace is more effective in eliminating the phosphorus and sulphur than the ordinary form of puddling-furnace.

Decomposing-furnace, a furnace used in the conversion of common salt into sulphate of soda, aided by the action of sulphuric acid.—Dumb furnace, a ventilating furnace placed at the foot of the up-cast shaft of a mine, and arranged in such a way that, while the dangerous gases are drawn away, they cannot come in contact with the fire.—Hardening-furnace, in hat-making a furnace in which the bodies of hats, soaked in wet cloth, are laid upon an iron plate and hardened by the pressure of traversing plates together with the heat and dampness.—High furnace, the ordinary blast-furnace, so called in literal translation from the French haut fourneau.—Hydrocarbon-furnace, a furnace in which a liquid fuel, as petroleum, is used.—Muffle-furnace, the small portable furnace in which is heated the muffle containing the cupels (see cupel) used in assaying gold and silver.—Osmand furnace, in metal-working, a primitive form of furnace formerly used in Sweden, and still in use in Finland, for reducing bog-iron ore. The lining of the furnace is of refractory stone. Surrounding this, with a considerable earth packed space intervening, is a crib of wood. The blast is furnished by bellows worked by treadles.—Pernot furnace, an open-hearth regenerative furnace for converting iron into steel, invented in France, but also introduced, with some modifications, to a limited extent in England. It requires for its use both pig and scrap. Its chief peculiarity is that its bed is inclined at a small angle (about 6°) and rotative.

Plumbers' furnace, a portable furnace used by plumbers for soldering, etc.—Regenerative furnace, a furnace in which the waste heat of the products of combustion is utilized by being transferred to either the air or the combustible gases, or both, entering the furnace. This transfer is effected by means of so-called "regenerators." See regenerator.
Reheating-furnace, a reverberatory furnace in which the puddled bars, piled in packets, are reheated preparatory to rolling, a baling-furnace.—Reverberatory furnace, a furnace in which the fuel is not brought directly in contact with the material to be acted on by the fire, but which is so arranged that the flame of the burning gases plays over or is "reverberated" upon the one or metal under treatment. A peculiar kind of reverberatory furnace used in the manufacture of steel is called the open hearth. See hearth.—Ring-top furnace, a chamber furnace for heating smoothing-irons. It has an annular top, and cross bars which can be removed at pleasure. E. H. Knight.—Spanish furnace, a form of reverberatory furnace used in Spain, and especially at Madrid, one of the most important lead producing districts in the world. Its chief peculiarity is the presence of two chambers, one of which is the reduction chamber, while the other has a peculiar and not entirely understood action in checking and modifying the draft.—Tank-furnace, in glass-making, a furnace fitted with a tank, as distinguished from comparatively small melting pots, to hold the molten glass.

furnace (fēr'nās), v. [< Furnace, n.] I. trans. 1. To subject to the action of a furnace; figuratively, to heat as if in a furnace.

M. A. Scheurer-Kestner claims to have proved that in the furnacing operation no soda salts are reduced to metallic sodium. (C. Diet., IV. 64.)

In soft Australian nights,
And through the furnaced noons, and in the times
Of wind and wet. Contemporary Rec., LII. 411.

2. To throw out, as flames or dull reverberations of sound are emitted by a furnace.

Furnace the universal sighs and complaints of this transposed world. Chapman, Shield of Achilles, Pref.

II. intrans. To issue forth like flames from a furnace.

O tell him [my absent love] that I lie Deep wounded with the flames that furnace d from his eye Quarles, Emblems, v. 1.

furnace-bar (fēr'nās-bār), n. Same as fire bar.
furnace-bridge (fēr'nās-brīj), n. A barrier of fire-bricks, or an iron-plate chamber filled with water, thrown across a furnace at the extreme end of the fire-bars, to prevent the fuel from being carried into the flues, and to quicken the draft by contracting the section of the chimney.

furnace-burning (fēr'nās-bēr'ning), n. Burning or heated like a furnace.

All my body's molature
Scars serves to quench my furnace burning heart.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., II. 1.

fu. naceman (fēr'nās-mān), n.; pl. furnacemen (-men). A man who tends a furnace.

The furnaceman reverses his shut valve.
Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXIII. 474.

furnament, n. See furniment.
furnarian (fēr'nā-ri-ān), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining or related to the genus Furnarius or family Furnariidae.

II. n. One of the Furnariidae, an oven-bird. Furnariidae (fēr'nā-ri-'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Furnarius + -idae.] A neotropical family of formicarioid passerine birds, related to the Dendrocaptidae, but differing from them somewhat in the structure of the feet; the South American oven-birds. These birds are so called from the oven-like nests which they build. They mostly have stiffened pointed tail feathers, and the general habits of creepers. Also written Furnacidae, Furnaridae.

Sp. Pg. It. furtivo, < L. furtivus, stolen, purloined, hence also hidden, concealed, secret, < furtum, theft, robbery, < furari, steal, thieve, < fur, a thief: see furacious and ferret.*] 1.
Stolen; obtained by theft.

Or do they (planets) . . .
Dart furtive Beams and Glory not their own,
All Servants to that Source of Light, the Sun?

Poem, Solomon, l.

2. Stealthy; thief-like.

It would be impossible for such eyes to squint, and take furtive glances on this side and on that.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 22.

That furtive moon, that scowling eye.

M. Arnold.

furtively (fēr'tiv-ly), adv. In a furtive manner;
stealthily.

She Did look upon him furtively
In loving wise.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 181.

furtum (fūr'tūm), n. [L., theft: see furtive.] In law, theft; robbery.

furuncle (fūr'ung-kul), n. [= F. furuncle = Sp.
furunculo = Pg. furunculo, frunculo = It. furunculo, < L. furunculus, a puffy thief, a pilferer, a pointed, burning sore, a boil, dim. of fur, a thief: see furacious, further.] A circumscribed inflammation of the skin, forming a necrotic central core, and suppurating and discharging the core; a boil.

furuncular (fūr'ung-kū-lār), a. [< L. furunculus, a furuncle, + -ar.] Pertaining to or exhibiting furuncles or boils.

furunculi, n. Plural of furunculus.

furunculosis (fūr'ung-kū-lō'sis), n. [NL., < furunculus + -osis.] In pathol., the morbid state characterized by the presence of furuncles or boils.

furunculus (fūr'ung-kū-lus), n.; pl. furunculi (-li). [L.] Same as furuncle.

fury (fūr'i), n.; pl. furies (-riz). [*Early mod.
E. also fur; < ME. furie, furge, < F. furie = Sp.
Pg. It. furia, < L. furia, commonly in pl. furie, rage, madness, fury; Furia, the Furies (also called Diræ, and (Gr.) Eumenides, Erinyes); < furere, rage, be furious.*] 1. Extreme anger or rage; anger or wrath which overrides all self-control; a storm of anger; madness.

I do oppose
My patience to his fury.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1.

As they rode on thro' (Carloch land)
He rode up in a fury.

The Hunter Lullie (Child's Ballads, IV. 101).

Thoult see my sword with furie smoke.

Robin Hood and the Tanner's Daughter (Child's Ballads, IV. 338).

2. Violent or impetuous action of any kind;
vehement manifestation of force; violence.

Foundations here are of a Christian Temple, and two towers of marble that have better related the fury of time.

Sandys, Travels, p. 16.

It was not the ships only that felt the fury of this storm, but the whole island suffered by it.

Dampier, Voyages, II. 91-71.

On the western coast of Britain where the Atlantic breaks in upon the shore, they have been known to exact a payment of between three and four tons on every square foot of surface exposed to their fury.

Harley, Physiography, p. 107.

3. Enthusiasm; inspired or frenzied excitement of the mind.

Her staring eyes with sparkling fury roll,
When all the god came rushing to her nod.

Drum, Enoch.

4. [cap.] In classical myth., one of the avenging deities, called in Greek mythology the Erinyes or, by euphemism, Eumenides, and by the Romans the Furie or Fere, daughters of Earth or of Night, represented as fearful maidens, often winged, and with serpents twined in their hair, clad in dusky garments girdled with red. They dwelt in the depth of Tartarus and, owing to their dread power of avenging wrong, whether intentional or not, were feared by gods and men. According to fully developed Greek tradition, they were three in number and called Tiphazæ, Allecto, and Megæra. They relentlessly punished crime, especially breaches of piety and hospitality, both before and after death. They were therefore also regarded as goddesses of fate, in common with the Færæ; hence the use of the name in the extract from Milton.

Come the blind Fury with the abhorred shears,
And slit the thin-nylon life.

Milton, Lycidas, l. 75.

Oh, the Furies that I feel within me; whipp'd on by their angers
For my tormentors.
Plebeian (and another?) Propetessa, iv. 1.
Hence—5. A minister or a concentrated manifestation of vengeance; an avenging or vengeful personality, principle, or action.

And be the sight, and better fruits of war;
And thousand furies wait on wealthy sword.
Spenser, F. Q. II. II. 30.

Four I do see, infernal tormentors, in their furies and vultures that vex and dragg'd by and Heaven has no rack, I have to be tormented turn'd,

Not hell a fury like a woman scorn'd.
Shakespeare, Mourning Bride, iii. 1.

Conscience, you put me to a woman's madness,
The glory of a man. Idem, Philaster, II. 1.

6f. [Found only in the passage quoted, where the pl. furies, with the sense of Lu. fures, thieves
(pl. of fur, a thief), is used, it seems, in jesting allusion to the Furies.] A the f.

Have an eye to your plate, for there by furies. Plebeian —Syn. 1. Verolence, Indignation, etc. See anger, 1 and 2. Violence, vehemence, tempestuousness, ferocity, hate.

fury (fu'ri), v. t.; pret. and pp. furied, ppr. fury-ing. [fury, n.] To infuriate; agitate violently. [Rare.]

As I would not neglect a so good opportunity, so I would not fury myself in the search.

Editha, Resolves, I. 10.

furze (fēr-z), n. [ME. firs, fyrs, fyrris, furze,
← AS. fyrr, furze (translated by Lu. thymus); connections unknown.] 1. The common name for the Ulex Europæus, a low, much-branched, and spiny leguminous shrub, with yellow flowers. It is abundant in barren, stony districts throughout the west of Europe, and sometimes covers large areas.
It is used for fuel, and the young shoots for fodder, and is also cultivated for ornament, especially a double flowered variety and a more slender and less rigid form known as fresh furze. The dwarf or tuft furze is a much smaller species, U. nanus. Also called spine and whin.

With a whip of furze. Piers Plowman (B), v. 351.
Fyrris, or quyre tre or gorsyt tre, ruscus.

Penzance, Parv., p. 102.

Now would I give a thousand furze for an acre of barren ground, long heath, brown furze, anything that I might have a hedge of.

Shakespeare, Tempest, I. 1.

2. A frizz. [Rare or obsolete.]

One furzed, if that high Furze of Hair
Was bona fide, all your own.
Pope, Posthumus and Pontia.

Needle furze, a species (Genista Anthracoides) and somewhat similar to Ulex Europæus. It has slender, finely pointed spines.

furze-bush, n. [Early mod. E. fyrrbush; ← furze + bush.] Furze. Palsgrave.

furze-chut (fēr'chut), n. The whinechut, Sarothra rubra; so called from its frequenting furze or gorse.

furze-chirper (fēr'chēr pēr), n. The brambling or mountain finch, Prinallia monticola.
Also furze shucker.

furze-chitter (fēr'chit'ēr), n. Same as *furze-
chut*. [Local, Eng.]

furze-hacker (fēr'hak'ēr), n. Same as *furze-
chut*. [Local, Eng.]

furselling (fēr'sel), n. [fur + sell.] Same as furze-green.

fursent (fēr'sent), n. and n. [ME. fursen, n.; furze + sent.] 1. A furze, furze. Holland.
II. n. Furze. Idem.

furze-wren (fēr'zēn), n. The Dartford warbler, Melophaga dartfordensis or M. virens.

furzy (fēr'zē), n. [fur + zy.] Overgrown with furze; full of furze.

Their route was laid Across the furze hills of land.

Scott, Marmion, iv. 1.

fusa (fū'sā), n.; pl. fuse (fū'zē). [It] In musical music, a quaver or eighth note.

Fusagasuga bark. See hark.

Fusanus (fu'sā-nūs), n. [NL.] A santalace-ous genus of trees and shrubs, natives of Australia.
F. spartea furnishes the fragrant and sweet wood of Yas-sandra. The hard close-grained wood of F. acuta in Yas is also known as cardinalwood, but has no perfume.
The pandanus tree is the fruit of the same tree. It is sweet and edible.

fusarole, fusarol (fu'sā-rōl), n. [F. fusar-ol, ← It. fusapoli, an astragal, ← pusapoli, fusapoli, a whitt to put on a spindle, ← pus, a spindle, ← Lu. fusax, a spindle, the shaft of a column.] In arch., an astragal.

fusate (fū'sāt), n. [NL.] Fusates, ← Lu. fusax, a spindle.] Same as fusiform.

fuse (fū'sē), n. [Sp. Fg. fusco = It. foveo, fusco, ← Lu. fusca, dark, swarthy, dusky, tawny, prob. orig. fuscus, allied to fuscus, dark, dusky, gloomy, and perhaps ult. to E. brown, q. v. Cf.

fuscous.] Same as fuscous. [Rare.]

Expectation was alert on the receipt of your strangeshaped present, while yet undrilled from its fuse envelope.

Lamb, To H. C. Robinson.

fuscation (fus-ka'shūn), n. [L. fuscare, darken, ← fuscus, dark; see fuse, fuscous.] Cf. abfuscate, abfuscation.] A darkening; obscurity.
Idem.

fuscescent (fu-se-sēnt), n. [L. fuscere, dark, dusky (see fuse), + -escent.] In ool. and bot., somewhat fuscous; approaching dark brown, or tinged with that color.

fuscin (fus'in), n. [L. fuscus, dark, dusky (see fuse), + -in.] A brownish matter obtained from empyreumatic animal oil. It is insoluble in water, but may be dissolved by alcohol.

fuscite (fus'it), n. [L. fuscus, dark (see fuse), + -ite.] Same as gabbroite.

fuscoferruginous (fus-ko-fēr'ō-nūs), n. [*L.
fuscus*, dark, dusky (see fuse), + ferrugineus, rusty; see ferruginous.] In entom., rust-colored with a brownish tinge.

fuscosteaceous (fus-kō'stē-ā'shūs), n. [*L.
fuscus*, dark, dusky (see fuse), + testaceus, brick-colored; see testaceous.] In entom., dull reddish-brown; testaceous with a reddish tinge.

fuscous (fus'kūs), n. [L. fuscus, dark, dusky; see fuse.] Brown; brown tinged with gray; of a dark, swarthy color.

In buildings, when the highest degree of the sublime is intended, the materials and ornaments ought neither to be white, nor green, nor yellow, nor blue, nor of a pale red, nor violet, nor spotted, but of a kind fuscous colour, as black, or brown, or deep purple, and the like.
Burke, Sublime and Beautiful, § 16.

fuse (fūz), v.; pret. and pp. fused, ppr. fusing.
[← Lu. fusus, pp. of funderē, pour out, shed; of metals, melt, cast, found; see found, and cf.
fuse, affuse, confuse, diffuse, effuse, infuse, profuse, suffuse, transfuse, etc.] I. trans. 1. To melt; liquefy by heat; render fluid.

I know the quarry whence he had the stone,
The forest, too, where all the timber grew;
The forge wherein his fused metal flowed.
Byron, Verses Intended to have been Spoken.

2. To blend or unite as if by melting together.

That delicious man Whose fancy fused old and new,
And flash'd into the true,
And mingled all without a plan.
Emerson, In Memoriam xvi.

The dramas of Jonson are formed of solid materials, bound and welded rather than fused together.

Idem, An Old Eng. Dram.

Agile whose ardent nature fused the small glow and of knowledge into principles, and the action into their mould.

Thoreau, Excursions, I. 10.

An island of the str. of Baffin, an island forming a world of its own, could not be fused into the mass of the Empire in the same way as the land which is geographically continuous. F. A. Peck, Arctic Exped., p. 12.

Syn. 1. Fuse, flow, etc. 2. To amalgamate.

II. intrans. 1. To melt, be reduced from a solid to a fluid state by heat.

Nature fuses with wisdom, and the rushing and melting of the heart. Idem, The Heart, p. 13.

2. To become intermingled and blended as if melted together.

With a heart the very fused of the heart, and the heart itself. Idem, The Heart, p. 13.

It is a cast as irregular, with most of its surface and the outside on both sides fused into one general mass. Idem, The Heart, p. 13.

fuse (fūz), n. [Abbr. of fuse.] A tube, containing, etc., of various materials, filled or saturated with a combustible compound, and used as an exploder for firing a blast or for detonating any exploding charge, as of a military shell. A fuse consists of a core, a primer, and a tail. The core is a small rod of iron or steel, and the primer is a small piece of explosive material, such as gunpowder, which is placed at the end of the tail. The tail is a long rod of a combustible material, such as gunpowder, which is used to burn down the fuse to the primer. The fuse is used to fire a shell, or to detonate any exploding charge.

while the combination-fuses combine the principles of the other classes with more or less complexity. See combination-fuse. Also spelled fuse. — Abbr. fuse, an electric fuse invented by Abel, the explosive material of which is composed of antimony and sulphuric acid of copper with potassium chlorate. It is fired by a spark. — Perforation-fuse, a fuse prepared for action by the shock of the discharge, and put in action on striking the object. Hazen. — Quantity-fuse, an electric fuse in which the conducting circuit is completed by a short piece of some substance, usually a metal, of tolerably high resistance, which is raised to a high temperature, practically to in-candescence, on the passage of a current of sufficient strength. — Safety-fuse, a slow-burning ribbon or tape for exploding a shell. — Tension-fuse, an electric fuse in which the conducting circuit is not complete, the firing being accomplished by the passage of a spark. — Wooden fuse, a hollow plug of wood filled with fuse composition firmly driven in the open end being protected from moisture by a water proof cap, used for exploding military shells. For service a part of the plug is cut off according to the length of time it is desired that the composition shall burn, and the plug is then driven into the hole in the shell.

fuse (fūz), n. [Of. fuse.] The track or trail of a buck in the grass. Also fusee.

There wants a scholar like an hound of a sure nose, that would not miss a true scent, nor run upon a false one, to trace these old fuses to their base.

By Hooker, Alp. Williams, I. 14.

fuseau (fū-zō'), n. [F., a spindle; see fusi.] The grip of a sword. Compare spindle.

fuse-anger (fūz'ā-jēr), n. An instrument for diminishing the time of burning of a fuse by removing a part of the incendiary composition from the exterior end of it.

fusee (fū-zē'), n. [Formerly also fusie;
← F. fusil (pron. fū-zē'), fusil; see fusi.] 1f.
Same as fusi. — 2. Same as fusi. — 3. A kind of match for lighting a pipe, cigar, and the like.
It is made of cardboard impregnated with niter and tipped with a composition which ignites by friction. *E.
H. Knight*.

Wax matches and fusees were unknown luxuries.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI., notes.

fusee (fū-zē'), n. [Formerly also fusie, fū-zē', ← OF. fusée, a thread, ← ML. fusata, a spindleful of thread, yarn, etc., orig. pp. fem. of fusa, use a spindle. Lu. fusus, a spindle. Cf. fusi.] 1f. A spindle-shaped figure.

The triangle is an half square, Lozenge, or Fusée, part of you the cross angles.

Pennsylvania, Arts of Eng. Poet., p. 78.

2. A cone or solid conical piece in a watch or a spring-clock on which is wound a chain or cord, attached at one end to its widest part and at the other to the barrel containing the mainspring, the action of which unwinds it, transferring it to the barrel. The object of the fusee is to equalize the effect of the mainspring, as its force is relaxed through regular diminution of tension, by gradually diminishing the resistance of the chain or cord through its increasing distance from the axis of the fusee. This axis is the arbor of the main wheel, which is attached to the fusee and imparts the motion derived from the spring to the other wheels. In many watches the fusee is dispensed with, its object being obtained by other contrivances. The term is also applied to a kind of mechanical contrivance used for other purposes. Also called fusee.

3. In horology, a kind of splint applied to the leg of a horse.

fusee (fū-zē'), n. See fusi.

fusee-engine (fū-zē'n-jīn), n. A machine for winding fuses for watches and clocks.

fuse-extractor (fū-zē'ktrāk'tōr), n. A powerful instrument used for extracting wooden fuses from loaded shells.

fuse-gage (fū-zē'jāj), n. An adjustable fuse-cutter for cutting time-fuses, as those of projectiles. It consists of a blade of wood with a graduated metal gage, or scale, and a blade of metal to cut off the fuse. The gage is marked to seconds and fractions, so that the fuse can be cut so as to burn just the length of time required.

fuse-hole (fū-zē'hōl), n. The hole in a shell prepared for the reception of the fuse.

fusell, n. Same as fusi.

fusella (fū-zē'lā), n.; pl. fuselle (fū-zē'lē). [It., dim.
of fusi.] In musical music, a sixteenth-note.

fusel-oil (fū-zē'l-ōl), n. [C. fusel, spirits of inferior quality, as bad brandy or gin perhaps ← Lu. fusus, fluid, liquid, molten; see fusi, fusell, + E. oil.] A mixture of homologues of ethyl alcohol (chiefly amyl alcohol), fatty acids, and other salts formed in small proportion during alcoholic fermentation. It has a high boiling point than ordinary alcohol, and gives it a strong spirituous liquor which contains it a strong and sometimes unpleasant rancid odor. It has irritant, poisonous properties. Fusel oil is separated from alcohol by fractional distillation. Also called racem-oil.

fuse-mallet (fūz'mal'et), n. A mallet of hard wood, used in connection with a fuse-setter, for driving a wooden fuse into a shell.

the water of crystallization has been expelled. -- Ignoble fusion, the melting of anhydrous salts by heat without their undergoing any decomposition. Latent heat of fusion, the heat which is expended in the molecular work involved in the change from the solid to the liquid state (see latent heat, under heat). Thus to change a pound of ice at the freezing point to a pound of water at the same temperature requires about 80 thermal units, which number expresses, therefore, the latent heat of the fusion of ice. — Point of fusion of metals, the degree of heat at which they melt or liquefy. This point is very different for different metals. Thus, mercury becomes liquid at -39° , while platinum requires for its fusion the intense heat produced by the oxyhydrogen blowpipe, it being infusible in the furnace. See under the names of the different metals the approximate fusing points of each.

fusionism (fu'zhon-izm), n. [< fusion + -ism.] Same as fusion, 3.

fusionist (fu'zhon-ist), n. [= F. fusioniste; an fusion + -ist.] In politics, one who advocates or supports some more or less temporary coalition of two or more parties or factions against another.

fusionless (fu'zhon-less), a. [See, also fusionless, fusionless; < fusion, fusion, abundance, etc., + less; see fusionless.] Same as fusionless.

fusoid (fu'soid), a. [< L. fusum, a spindle, + (Gr. idios, form).] Same as fusiform.

fuss (fus), n. [A colloq. and dial. word, scarcely found in literary use before the 19th century; the record is therefore defective. The noun appears to be due to the adj. fussy, which is prob. an extended form (with the common adj. suffix -y) of ME. fus, fous, eager, anxious, < A.S. fus, ready, prompt, quick, eager; see fouse, and cf. ferz, ferel, the derived verb.] 1. Trifling, useless, or annoying activity; disorderly bustle; an anxious display of petty energy.

Old mother Dalmaine, with all her fuss, was ever a bad cook, and overdid everything. Diary, Young Duke.

2. A disturbing course of action; a display of perturbed feeling; disturbance; tumult; as, to make a fuss over a disappointment.

Why, here you Master in a most violent fuss, and no mortal soul can tell for what. Fairbridge, Confederate, iv.

People had not learned how to meet and dance without making a fuss over it, taking up carpets, putting candles in the sconces, keeping late hours, and having a supper, the preparation of which was mainly done by the ladies of the house. W. Beant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 80.

3. A large, fat, bustling person.

That great ramping Fuss, thy Daughter, . . . Rambles about from place to place. Cotton, Burlesque upon Burlesque, p. 233.

Madam, o' Sunday Morning at Church I entreated to you, and looked at a great Fuss in a glaring light dress next Bow. Steele, Grisel à la Mode, III. 1.

fuss (fus), v. [< fuss, n.] 1. intrans. To make much ado about trifles; make a bustle.

He fussed, fretted, commanded, and was obeyed. Scott.

II. trans. To disturb or confuse with trifling matters.

Her intense quietude of bearing suited Miss Gryce, who could not bear to be fussed. Cornhill, Mar.

fussball (fus'hāl), n. See fuzball.

fussify (fus'i-fi), v. t. or t. pret. and pp. fussified, ppr. fussifying. [< fuss + -ify.] To fuss; make a fuss about. [Vulgar.]

fussily (fus'i-li), adv. In a fussy or bustling manner.

Followed by a long train of clients, . . . the middleidget-od fussily away. Bulwer, Last Days of Pompeii, p. 13.

fussiness (fus'i-nēs), n. The state of being fussy; bustle, especially needless or disorderly bustle.

She was fussy, no doubt, but her real activity bore a fair proportion to her fussiness. Marrat, Surrey.

That exaltation of English character which seems wholly compatible with British fussiness. Harper's Mag., LXXVII, 364.

fusslet (fus'let), v. t. Same as fuzle.

fussock (fus'gk), n. [< fuss, n., 3. + -ock.] A large, fat woman. [Prov. Eng.]

fussy (fus'i), a. [Now regarded as fuss, n., + -y; but perhaps orig. an extended form of ME. fus, fous, eager, anxious; see fuss, n., and fouse.] Moving and acting with fuss; bustling; making much ado about trifles; making more ado than is necessary.

The 'over formal' often impede, and sometimes frustrate business, by a dilatory, tedious circumspection, and (what in colloquial language is called) fussy way of conducting the simplest transactions. Whitely, Note on Bacon's Essay of Securus Wise.

Very fussy about his food was Sergeant B., and much trotting of attendants was necessary when he partook of nourishment. L. M. Usher, Hospital Sketches, p. 38.

fust (fust), n. [< OF. fust, fust, fust, fust, a stick, stock, stake, log, shaft, branch or stem of a tree, a tree, wood, etc., F. fust, stock, zando, forzato.

1. The seventh letter and fifth consonant in the English alphabet. It is a sign of Italian origin, having been fabricated by the Romans by a slight modification of C, when the distinction of the (hard) g sound from the k sound, both until then represented alike by c, was found advisable and was effected. (See C.)

G has in English two principal or normal sounds, usually called "hard g" and "soft g" respectively. The former is the value originally belonging to the sign. The "hard" g-sound is the sonant (or voiced, or intoned) correlative of the k sound, made by a close contact between the upper surface of the back part of the tongue and the adjacent palate, while breath enough to set the vocal chords vibrating is, during the continuance of the contact, forced up into the pharynx; the breath of this contact, as in the case of the other so-called mutes (or stops, or checks), giving the alphabetic element. The k- and g-sounds are most often called the guttural mutes, although (since the guttural proper has nothing to do with their formation) many authorities prefer to call them palatal, or back palatal. The "soft" sound of g in English is compound (g = dzh), the sonant correlative of the ch-sound (see ch); it is, like the soft c sound in relation to hard c, a product of the alteration of the hard g, the point of contact being shifted forward on the tongue, and a spirant or sibilant vanishing being added to the mute element. It belongs mainly to the Romance part of the language. It never occurs at the beginning of words of Anglo-Saxon origin (where g is always hard or has changed to g), and but rarely at the end of such words (before "silent" e, as in finger, conge, average). Except in such instances g, in words of Romance origin, is hard also before e and i. The principal digraphs containing g are gh and gn. The former is written instead of the earlier guttural spirant h (as night for earlier nicht), and is either silent (as in right) or pronounced as gh (as in laugh). With the digraph gn is written the nasal which corresponds to g and k in the same manner as n to d and t, or m to b and p, and which (for example, in sonnet) is just as much a simple sound as n or m. This guttural or palatal nasal is not an independent alphabetic element in any such way as n or m, in the other stages of the languages of our family. It appears only before a next following e or i, as a nasal made guttural by assimilation to them; and the condition n representing it is simply one in which the g, formerly pronounced gh, has become silent, like the h of nh in laugh, climb, comb, etc. G is now silent before a in the same syllable, as in mass, gamb. For g as the original of consonant g, see c.

2. As a medieval Roman numeral, 400, and with a line over it, \overline{G} , 400,000.—3. In the calendar, the seventh dominical letter.—4. In music: (a) The key-note of the major key of one sharp, having the signature shown at 1, or of the minor key of two flats, having the signature shown at 2; also, in medieval music, the final of the Mixolydian mode. (b) In the fixed system of solmization, the fifth tone of the scale, and called sol: hence so named by French musicians. (c) On the keyboard of the pianoforte, the white key next to the left of the middle of each group of three black keys. (d) The tone given by such a key, or a tone in unison with such a tone. (e) The degree of a staff assigned to such a key or tone; with the treble clef, the second line or the first added space above, as at 3. (f) A note on such a degree, indicating such a key or tone, as at 4.—5. In physics, a symbol for acceleration of gravity, which is about 9.8 meters (or 32 feet) per second.—6. In chem., a symbol for plutonium, now rarely used, G being substituted for it.—G clef. See clef.

Gut lasses' hearts gang startin Whiles fast at night. Burns, Halloween
Gift of gab, or of the gab, a talent for talking, fluency used in jest or in obloquy.

I talways knew you had the gift of gab, of course, but I never believed you were half the man you are Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xviii gab² (gab), n. [Sc. = North. E. gab, the mouth; see gab¹.] The mouth.

Ye take mair in your gab than your cheeks can hold [Scott, Scottish Proverbs, p. 86]

gab³ (gab), v. t. [Appar. < gab², the mouth; or a var. of gab or gab, assimilated to gab².] To project like a tusk.

Of teeth there be three sorts, for either they be framed like saws, or cleaved fast, even and full, or last of all stand out like a tusk. Holwell, v. of Elms, XI, 75

gab¹ (gab), n. [Origin obscure.] A hook or crook; specifically, the hook on an eccentric rod which engages the wrist on the rock shaft lever of a valve-motion. L. H. Knight.

gab² (gab), n. [OF. also gab, gab, m., also gabe, f. = Fr. gab = It. gabbo, a jest, joke, mock, mockery, = Pg. gaba, praise (ult. identical with gab¹, n., q. v.; from the verb. see under gab¹, v.) A jest; joke; mock; a piece of pleasantry.

On no account perhaps (the "Fall of King Arthur") more remarkable than the fact of the close imitation of the famous gaba made by Charlemagne and his companions at the court of King Hugin, which was first met with in a romance of the twelfth century. It is to be presumed that the author of the ballad borrowed from the printed work, substituting Arthur for Charlemagne, and calling Hugin for Oliver, Tristan for Roland, etc., and ended his story by converting King Hugin's rye into a "bold legend," by whose agency the gaba were accomplished. Child's Ballads, I, 137, App.

gabaraget (gab'ā-rāg), n. [Perhaps connected with gabardine (2).] Coarse packing-cloth; a term formerly used for the wrappers in which Irish goods were packed.

gabardine, gaberdine (gab'ār-dēn', -ār-lēn'), n. [= It. quardina, formerly also carcardina = OF. galvardine, Sp. gabardina, a gabardine; appar. extended from Sp. gabán, a great coat with hood and close sleeves, = OF. gaban = It. gabano, a shepherd's cloak, dim. gabanello, a gabardine, etc.; perhaps connected with Sp. cabaza, a large cloak with hood and sleeves, caballa, a cabin, hut, etc.; see cabala, cabu, capel, capouch, capuchin, etc.] A long loose cloak or frock, generally coarse, with or without sleeves and a hood, formerly worn by common men out of doors, and distinctively by Jews when their mode of dress was regulated by law; hence, any similar outer garment worn at the present day, especially in Eastern countries.

You call me misbeliever, cut throat dog,
And spit upon my Jewish gaberdine,
And all for use of that which is mine own.
Shak., M. of V., I, 2.
The storm is come again; my best way is to creep under his gaberdine.
Shak., Tempest, II, 2
Under your gabardine wear pistols all Swickard, The Goblins
Here was a Tangle merchant in sky blue gaberdine,

T. E. Atchick, Pookapook to Pook, p. 208.

gabatat (gab'ā-tā), n. [< L. gubata, a kind of dish or platter; ML. as in def.] Eccles., a vessel suspended in a church, probably to hold a light. See basin, 3.

gabbard, gabbart (gab'ārd, -ārt), n. [Formerly also gabard, gabart, gabert, < F. gabare = It. gabarra, a lighter, a store-ship; hence dim. F. gabaret, ML. gabarotus. Cf. gabata.] A kind of heavy-built vessel, barge, or lighter, intended especially for inland navigation; as, a coal-gabbard. [Obsolete or dialectal.]

Curiously enough the vessels like unto ye French Gabards, sailing daily upon the river of Bordeaux, which saile wth a misen or triangle saile.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 122
Little gabards with coals and groceries, &c., come up here from Bristol
Dr. T. Campbell, Diary (1775), quoted in N. and Q., [7th ser.], IV, 119

I swung and bobbed yonder as safe as a gabbard that's mended by a three-ply cable at the Broomfield.
Scott, Rob Roy, xxvi gabbatha (gab'ā-thā), n. [Heb., platform.] The place where Pilate sat at Christ's trial. It appears to have been a tessellated pavement outside the tribunal or judgment hall, on which the tribunal was placed, from which the governor pronounced final sentence.

When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment seat in a place that he called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha.
John xix, 13.

gabbet, v and n. A Middle English form of gab.

gabbler¹ (gab'ēr), n. [ME. gabber, a liar, deceiver; < gab¹ + -er.] 1. One who gabs, prates, talks idly, or lies.

He is a japer and a gabber, and no veray (true) repentant, that (trowe) doth thing for which hym oughte to repente.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Breatheth for't the gabber's spile
We scaddit heart (throat) festered by much talking!
Tennyson, Poems, p. 106.

2. A person skilful in the art of burlesque. Franklin, Autobiog. (ed. 1840), p. 57.

gabbler² (gab'ēr), v. t. and i. [< D. gabberen, gabble; a var. of gabbe, freq. of gab¹. Cf. equiv. jabber.] To gabble. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

gabbinge, n. [ME. gabbinge, verbal n. of gab¹, v.] Idle talk; prating; lying; deceit.

His wipne was at wylde charyte, and to by him
With gloynge and with gabbinge, he cyled the people.
Piers Plowman (B), xv, 124.

Such outbursts may be thought the style
York Plays, p. 167.

By ye right way, when the chibbe shalbe borne (shall well knowe), yet ye have more of gabbinge, and I have very true in God that ye have more of gabbe, ye shall not be dead the first.
Wyclif (E. T. S.), I, 18.

gabble (gab'bl), v. t. pret. and pp. gabbled, ppr. gabbling. [Take gabber² (= D. gabberen), gabbe, freq. of gab¹. Cf. the assimilated forms gabbe and jabber, and cf. gabber.] I. intrans. 1. To talk noisily and rapidly; speak incoherently or without sense; prate; jabber.

Such a rant and such a gabble,
Run to hear Jack Pudding gabble.
Swift.
Upon my coming near them six or eight of them surrounded me in horselack, and began to gabble in their own language.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, I, 116.

2. To utter inarticulate sounds in rapid succession, like a goose when feeding.

When'er the trod gadman put'd around,
The squeaking page her bounty own'd.
Not to the waddling duck or gabbling goose
Did she glad sustenance refuse.

Smollett, Burlesque Tale.

[Who] hisps and gabbles if he tries to talk.

Cable, Works, II, 104.

II. trans. 1. To utter noisily, rapidly, and incoherently; as, to gabble a lesson. [Colloq.]
—2. To affect in some way by gabbling.

What do I talk about the gift of tongues? It was no gift, but the confusion of tongues which has gabbled me deaf as a post.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, I.

gabble (gab'li), n. [< gabble, v.] 1. Loud or rapid talk without sense or coherence.

Forthwith a hideous gabble rises loud

Among the builders; each to other calls,

Not understood. Milton, P. L., xii, 58.

He [the driver] talks incessantly, calls the horses by name, makes long speeches, . . . The conductor is too dignified a person to waste himself in this gabble.

G. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, p. 232.

2. Inarticulate chattering, as of fowl.

Chough's language, gabble enough, and good enough.

Shak., All's Well, IV, 1.

—Syn. 1. See prattle, n.

gabblement (gab'l-ment), n. [< gabble + -ment.] The act of gabbling; senseless talk; prate; jabber. [Rare.]

They rush to the attack . . . with caperings, shoutings, and vociferations, which, if the Volunteer Company stands firm, dwindle into staggerings, into quick gabblement, into panic flight.

Carlyle, French Rev., II, v, 4.

"This court's got as good ears as any man," said the magistrate, "but they ain't for to hear no old woman's gabblement, though it's under oath."

Chron. of Pinerville.

gabbler (gab'ler), n. One who gabbles; a prater; a noisy, silly, or incoherent talker.

gabbling (gab'ling), n. [Verbal n. of gabble, v.] Incoherent babble; jabber.

Barbarians, who are in every respect scarce one degree above brutes, having no language among them, but a confused gabbling, which is neither well understood by themselves or other.

Spectator, No. 380.

gabbro (gab'rō), n. [A word of obscure origin used in Italy, but more especially in the neighborhood of Florence, and by the marble-workers there, and introduced into lithological science by Von Buch in 1809.] A rock of varied lithological character, essentially, according to the present general acceptance of the name among lithologists, a crystalline-granular aggregate of plagioclase and dihalage, with which often occur magnetite (or menachante) and apatite. Often the dihalage is associated with a rhombic pyroxene (bronzeite or hypersthene, two closely allied members of the augite or pyroxene family), and when this predominates the rock passes into what is called norite. Gabbro is also frequently present, and the predominance of this mineral gives rise to combinations to which the names olivine-gabbro and olivine-norite have been given. The original gabbro of Von Buch, now called gabbro di Cornalba, is one of the many alternative forms of gabbro proper, which is perhaps the most perplexing of all rocks in respect to the manifold nature of the alterations it is liable to undergo. In regard to the nomenclature of many of these there is not much present unity among lithologists. Gabbro rosso (It., red gabbro), a rock occurring at the junction of the serpentine and the magenta (a micaceous sandstone) of Tuscany, is an altered sedimentary formation very variable in texture and composition. Gabbro verde (It., green gabbro), or gabbro simply, as it is sometimes called, is serpentine. The gabbro verde of Tuscany does not contain dihalage; the rock called gabbro in Corsica, on the other hand, has crystals of dihalage disseminated through the serpentine. Felsite di Cornalba (It., Corsica green), a variety of gabbro now called by Italians granitoida and egolite (epidote) is the beautiful green stone extensively employed in the interior decorations of the Medicean chapel in Florence. It is a crystalline aggregate of saussurite and amethystine (a grass green variety of hornblende). See hypersthene.

gabbroic (gab-rō'ik), a. [< gabbro + -ic.] Of or of the nature of gabbro; as, gabbroic rocks.

It is becoming more and more evident that eruptions of gabbroic and granitic rocks must be admitted as important elements in the (the Cascade range's) construction.

Science, IV, 71.

gabbroite (gab'rō-nit), n. [< gabbro + -ite.] A mineral, supposed to be a variety of scapolite, occurring in masses, whose structure is more or less foliated, or sometimes compact. Its colors are gray, bluish, or greenish-gray, and sometimes red. Also gabbroite and fuscite.

gabby (gab'i), a. [< gabl + -y.] Talkative; chattering; loquacious. [Colloq.]

On condition I were an alib.

As either thee or honest Gabby. Ramsay.

gabel (gä'bel), n. [Formerly also gabell; < F. gabelle = Fr. gabella, gabala = Sp. gabala = It. gabella (ML. gaballa, gabulum, gabulum), a tax, impost, prob. < AS. gafol, gafol, gafel, ME. gavel, ibute, tax, rent; see gavel.] A tax, impost, or excise duty, especially in continental Europe; formerly, in France, specifically the tax on salt, but also applied to taxes on other industrial products.

The three estates ordered that the gabel of salt should run through the refuse.

Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I, clv.

He enabled St. Peter to pay his gabel by the ministry of a fish.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, II, 6.

The gabela of Naples are very high on oil, wine, tobacco, and indeed on almost everything that can be eaten, drunk, or worn.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn), I, 429.

gabel (gä'bel), v. t.; pret. and pp. gabed or gabbed, pp. gabeling or gabelling. [< gabel, n.] To tax. [Rare.]

gabeler, gabeller (gä'bel-er), n. A collector of the gabel or of taxes. [Rare.]

gabella, gaballa (gä-bel'ä, -vel'ä), n. [ML. see gabel.] In Teut. and early Eng. hist., the peasantry constituting a village or hamlet; the holdings of such a group of freemen and serfs, or of either. The original significance of the word seems to be in its indication of a small rent-paying community, the rents being rendered in kind or in labor.

So that Gabella meant all the members of a family having an interest in a certain holding, and sometimes meant the holding itself.

W. K. Sullivan, Int. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. lxxvii.

gabell (gä-bel'), n. [F.: see gabel.] See gabel.

gabeller, n. See gabeler.

gabelman (gä-bel-man), n.; pl. gabelmän (-men). [< gabel + man; see gabel.] A tax-collector; a gabeler. [Rare.]

He flung gabelmän and excise-men into the river Durraue . . . when their claims were not clear.

Carlyle, Misc., IV, 70.

gaberdine, gaberdeine, n. See gabardine.

gaberlunyle, gaberlunzie (gab-er-lun'yi, -zi), n. [Sc. (the z repr. the old form of y, as in assolzie, etc.), said to be < gaber, short for gaberdine, + lunyle, wallet.] 1. A wallet or pouch; especially, a pouch or bag carried by Scotch beggars for receiving contributions, as of meal or other food.

Follow me frae town to town,

And carry the Gaberlunye on.

Ritson's Scottish Songs, I, 166.

2. Short for gaberlunye-man.

I am no that clean unprovided for neither; and though I should die at the back of a dale, they'll find as muckle quilted in this auld blue gown as will bury me like a Christian; . . . was there's the gaberlunzie's burial provided for, and I need nae mair.

Scott, Antiquary, xli.

gaberlunye-man, gaberlunzie-man (gab-er-lun'yi-man, -zi-man), n. A beggar who carries a pouch for alms; a poor guest who cannot pay for his entertainment. [Scotch.]

She's aff with the gaberlunye man.

Ritson's Scottish Songs, I, 167.

gabian (gä'bi-an), n. [See def.] A variety of petroleum or mineral naphtha exuding from the strata at Gabian, a village in the department of Hérault, France.

gabilla (ga-bil'ä; Sp. pron. gä-bä'lyä), n. [Cuban.] A finger or parcel of tobacco in Cuba, consisting of about 36 to 40 leaves. The bales are usually made up of 80 hands, each of 4 gabillas. Simmonds.

gabion (gä'bi-on), n. [< OF. gabion, F. gabion, < It. gabione, a gabion, a large cage, aug. of gabba, a cage, coop, basket, = E. cage; see cage.] 1. In fort., a large basket of wickerwork constructed with stakes and osiers, or green twigs, in a cylindrical form, but without a bottom, varying in diameter from 20 to 70 inches, and in height from 33 inches to 5 or 6 feet, filled with earth, and serving to shelter men from an enemy's fire. In a siege, when making a trench, a row of gabions is placed on the outside nearest the fortress, and filled with earth dug from the trench, forming a breast-work that is proof against musketry fire. By increasing the number of rows to cover the points of junction, complete protection can be attained. Gabions are also largely used to form the foundations of dams and jetties. They are filled with stones, and sunk or anchored in streams where they will become loaded with silt. See jetty.

2. See the quotation.

[Gabions are] curiosities of small intrinsic value, whether rare books, antiquities, or small articles of the fine or of the useful arts.

Scott, quoted in Harper's Mag., LX XVIII, 779.

Gabion battery. See battery. — Gabion-form, a circular piece of wood having nine equidistant notches cut in its circumference, to serve as guides for placing the pickets which form the frame for the gabion. Also called directing circle, form, and sometimes bas bottom.

gabionade, gabionnade (gä'bi-on-äd'), n. [< F. gabionnade, < It. gabionata, intrenchment of gabions, < gabione, gabion: see gabion.] 1. In fort., a work formed chiefly of gabions, especially the gabions placed to cover guns from an enfilading fire.

Gabionades used as traverses to protect guns from enfilading fire.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII, 272.

2. Any hydraulic structure composed in whole or part of gabions sunk in a stream to control the current.

gabionage (gä'bi-on-äj), n. [< gabion + -age.] The supply or disposition of gabions in a fortification.

gabioned (gä'bi-on-d), a. [< gabion + -ed.] In fort., furnished with, formed of, or protected by gabions.

The fourth day were planted under the gard of the cloister two deny-cannons and two colourings against the town, defended or gabioned with a crosse wall, thorow the which our battery lay.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II, ii, 140.

He told me he had a plan of attacking Cherbourg by flouting batteries, strongly parapetted and gabioned, which he was sure would succeed.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I, 379.

gabionnade, n. See gabionade.

gabli (gä'bl), n. [E. dial. also gavel; < ME. gable, gabyt, < OF. F. gable, < ML. gabulum, gabulum, a gable, < OHG. gabala, gabul, MHG. gabale, gabul, G. gabul, a fork, = MLG. gaffele, geffele = D. gaffel (> Icel. gaffall, Sw. Dan. gaffel), a fork, = AS. geaf, a fork, E. gaffe, q. v., = Icel. gaf = Sw. gafel = Dan. gaf, a gable; cf. L. gabulus, a kind of gallows (of Teut. or Celtic origin); prob. all of Celtic origin: Ir. gabhal, a fork, a gable, = Gael. gabhal = W. gaf, a fork. Similar in form and sense to the above words, and partly confused with them, although appar. of different origin, are OHG. gibil, gable, fore part, MHG. gabli, G. gabli, gabli, = MLG. D. gavel, a gable, = Goth. gibla, a pin-nacle; these words are perhaps connected with OHG. gebal, MHG. gebel, skull, head, OHG. gibilla, head, perhaps = (Gr. αφαρ), head. See gaff.] 1. In arch., the end of a ridged roof which at its extremity is not hipped or returned on itself, but cut off in a vertical plane, together with the triangular expanse of wall from the level of the eaves to the apex; distinguished from a pediment in that the cornice is not carried across the base of the triangle.

Thatched were the roofs, with dormer windows; and gabli projecting over the basement below protected and shaded the doorway.

Longfellow, Evangeline, I, 1.

2. Any architectural member having the form of a gable, as a triangular canopy over a window or a doorway.—3. The end-wall of a house; a gable-end.

The houses stand sideways backward into their yards, and onely endwaies with their gabli towards the street.

Fuller, Worthies, Exeter.

Mutual gable, in Scots law, a wall separating two houses, and common to both.

We constantly speak of a mutual gable, or a gable being mean and common to conterminous proprietors.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV, 66.

Stepped gable, a gable in which the outline is formed by a series of steps, called corbel-steps.

gable², n. [< ME. gable, gaballa, an irreg. form of cable, q. v.] A cable. Chapman.

gad (gád), n. [< ME. gad (gád, gadde, pl. gaddes, another form (with doubled consonant and shortened vowel, due to Scandinavian influence; see below) of gad (gád), gade (> E. goad), < AS. gād (see gāde, whence in some dictionaries an erroneously assumed nom. gādn*), a goad, gad, = leel, gaddr = Sw. gadd, a gad, goad, = ODan. gad, a gad, goad, guide, a gadfly; see further under goad, which is etymologically the normal E. form.] 1. A point or pointed instrument, as a pointed bar of steel, a spear, or an arrow-head.

Whose greedy stomach steely gads digest;
Whose craped train adorns triumphant crests.

Sylvestor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 6

I will go get a leaf of brass
And with a gad of steel will write these words

Shak., III. And, iv. 1.

"Dell be in me, but I'll put this hot gad down for throat!" cried he in an ecstasy of wrath, snatching a bar from the forge.

Scott, Waverley, xxx.

2. A sharp point affixed to a part of the armor, as the gauntlet, which could thus be used to deal a formidable blow.—3. A thick pointed nail; a gad-nail; specifically, in mining, a pointed tool used for loosening and breaking up rock or coal which has been shaken or thrown down by a blast, or which is loose and jointly enough to be got without the use of powder. It is intermediate between a drill and a wedge, but is properly called a gad only when ending in a point, and not in an edge, as a wedge. Old drills are often made into gads, which may be of any length, but from six inches to a foot is common.

4. A wedge or ingot of steel or iron. Johnson.
Flemish steel is brought down the Rhine to Dort and other parts, some in bars and some in gads, and therefore called Flemish steel, and sometimes gad steel.

Mason, Mechanical Exercises

5. A stick, or rod of wood, sharpened to a point, or provided with a metal point, used to drive cattle with; a gad; hence, a slender stick or rod of any kind, especially one used for whipping. [Still in general colloquial use.]

Their horsemen are with jacks for most part clad.
Their horses are both swift of course and strong.

They run on horseback with a slender rod,
And like a spear, but that it is more long.

See J. Harrington, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, x. 73

Affliction to the soul is like the gad to the oxen, a teacher of obedience.

To fawning dogs some times I gave a blow,
And flung some scraps to such as nothing had.

But in my hands still kept a golden gad

See J. Milton, p. 517

6. A gadfly. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]—7. In old Scotch prisons, a round bar of iron crossing the condemned cell horizontally at the height of about six inches from the floor, and strongly built into the wall at both ends. The ankles of a prisoner sentenced to death were secured with shackles which were connected by a chain about four feet long, with a large iron ring which traveled on the gad. Watch dogs are now sometimes fastened in a similar way. Upon or on the gad, upon the spur or the put of the moment, as if driven by a gad.

Keat banished thee? and France in choler parted?
And the king came to night? prescribed his power!
Confin'd to exhibition! All this done Upon the gad!

Shak., Lear, l. 2.

gad (gád), v. t.; pret. and pp. gadded, ppr. gadding. [< gad, n., 3.] 1. To fasten with a gad-nail. Hallucell.—2. In mining, to break up or loosen with the gad, use the gad upon.

gad (gád), v. t.; pret. and pp. gadded, ppr. gadding. [First in 16th century; prob. < gad, 6, the gadfly—"to flit about like a gad-fly" (Hallucell), or "from the restless running about of animals stung by the gadfly" (Imp. Diet., v. Cf. Old. assula, a gadfly, a goad (mod. assula, a horse-fly, hornet, stinging-fly, whence assular, "to be bitten with a horse-fly, to leap and skip as a horse or ox bitten by flies, to be wild or raging" (Florio), mod. assular, smart, rage, be in a passion.)] 1. To flit about restlessly; move about uneasily or with excitement.

On the shores stood closely together great numbers of Bertines, and among them women gadding up and downe frantically in mourning robes, their heads hanging about their ears, and shaking from under.

See Ch. C. The Romans, an. 62

A fierce, loud buzzing breeze, their stings drew blood,
And drive the cattle gadding through the wood.

Byden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, III

2. To ramble about idly, from trivial curiosity or for gossip.

Give the water no passage, neither a wicked woman liberty to gad about

Ecclus. xiv. 25

Envy is a gadding passion, and walketh the streets, and doth not keep home

Bacon, Envy (ed. 1667)

The student and lover of nature has this advantage of people who gad up and down the world, seeking some novelty or excitement: he has only to stay at home and see the procession pass

The Century, XXV. 672

Hence—3. To ramble or rove; wander, as in thought or speech; straggle, as in growth.

Desert caves,

With wild thyme and the gadding vine o'ergrown.

Milton, Lycidas, l. 40.

Now gads the wild vine o'er the pathless ascent.

Wordsworth, Fort Fuentes.

The good nurse would check her gadding tongue

Full often.

Tennyson, Gullivera,

And there the gadding woodbine crept about.

Byron, The Burial Place.

gad (gád), n. [< gad, v.] The act of gadding or rambling about; used in the phrase on or upon the gad. [Colloq.]

I have no very good opinion of Mrs. Charles' nursery-maid, I hear strange stories of her; she is always upon the gad.

Jane Austen, Persuasion, vi.

Thou might have a bit of news to tell one after being on the gad all the afternoon.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xiv.

gad (gád), n. [A minced form of God, occurring also in gad-zooks, begad, egad, etc.] The name of God, minced as an oath. Compare egad.

How he still cries "Gad!" and talks of popery coming on, as all the fanatics do.

Peppys, Diary, Nov. 24, 1662.

gadabout (gad'á-bout'), n. and a. 1. One who gads or walks idly about, especially from motives of curiosity or gossip. [Colloq.]

Mr. Rumble woke up briskly when the Colonel entered. "It is you, you gadabout, is it?" cried the civilian.

Thackeray, Newcomes, viii.

II. a. Gadding; rambling.

Why should I after all abuse the gadabout propensities of my countrymen? T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, l. 1.

gadboot (gad'bót), n. [< gad + boot.] Same as gadfly.

You see an ass with a blizz or a gadbee under his tail, or fly that stings him, run hither and thither without keeping any path or way.

L'equart, tr. of Rabelais, l. 46.

A noisome lout that as the gadbee stings.

Brentano, Artemis Prologia.

gad-bush (gad'búsh), n. A name given in Jamaica to the Acrotholium gracile, a leafless mistletoe.

gad-cracking, n. A whip-cracking. See the extract.

At Haddon, in Lincolnshire, there is still annually practiced on this day (Palm Sunday) a remarkable custom, called gad cracking, . . . which is fully explained in the following petition, presented to the House of Lords in May, 1830, by the lord of the manor; but without effect, as the ceremony was repeated in 1837: . . . A cart-whip of the fashion of several centuries since, called a gad-whip, . . . is, during divine service, cracked in the church porch. Hampson, Medit. Ant. Kalendarium (1841), l. 182.

gadded (gad'éd), a. [= ODan. gaddet, furnished with a goad; as gad + -ed.] Furnished with gads or sharp points.

The gauntlets . . . are richly ornamented on the knuckles but not gadded.

J. R. Planché.

gadder (gad'er), n. 1. A rambler; one who roves idly about.

Shure or not, the resident Londoners were great play-goers, and gadders generally.

Doran, Annals of Eng. Stage, l. xli.

2. In quarrying, same as gadding-machine.

It is claimed for the diamond gadder that it will do its work at the rate of 120 feet a day in rock of as soft and even a texture as marble.

See Amer., N. S., LV. 21

gadding (gad'ing), n. [Verbal n. of gad, v.] The act of going about idly, or of moving from place to place from mere curiosity; an idle visit.

Whilst we are environed with numerous outward objects, which, smiling on us, give us gadding to them the temptation of an inviting welcome, how inclined are we to forget, and wander from our great Master!

Boyle, Works, II. 294.

gadding-car (gad'ing-kär), n. Same as gadding-machine.

gaddingly (gad'ing-ly), adv. In a gadding or roving manner.

gadding-machine (gad'ing-má-shén'), n. In quarrying, a platform on which a steam-drill is mounted for drilling holes in getting out dimension-stone. The platform can be moved from hole to hole as may be necessary. Also gadder, gadding car. [U. S.]

The gadding-machines drill or bore circular holes along the bottom and sides of the blocks, into which wedges are introduced and the stone split from its bed.

See Amer., N. S., LV. 21.

gaddish (gad'ish), a. [< gad + -ish.] Disposed to gad or wander idly about.

gaddishness (gad'ish-nés), n. The quality of being gaddish; the habit of idle roving.

Grey hairs may have nothing softer than gaddishness, and folly many years old.

Abp. Leighton, On 1 Pet. III. 13.

gade (gád), n. A fish; same as rockling. See Motella.

gadean (gá'dē-an), n. [< Gadus + -an.] Same as gadoid.

Italian advertising cod liver oil (or what they wish to be taken for cod liver oil) do the best they can for themselves by employing the appellation for the only marine gadean common in Italy, the hake. N. and Q., 7th ser., IV, 278.

gaderer, v. A Middle English form of gather.

gadfly (gád'flī), n.; pl. gadflies (-flīz). [< gad¹ + fly². Cf. gad¹ and gadlike in the same sense.]

1. The popular name of sundry flies which goad or sting domestic animals, as a breeze, breeze-fly, or horse-fly; specifically, a dipterous insect of the family Tabanidae and suborder Brachycera, representing almost a superfamily Hexacheta. They are comparatively large, very active, voracious, and bloodthirsty, with great powers of biting, the mouth parts being more highly developed than those of any other dipterous insect. They have also great power of flight. The bite is deep and painful, often drawing blood, though not poisonous. In strictness, only the females are gadflies, the males being smaller and quite inoffensive, living on juices of plants. There are more than 1,000 species, of the genera Tabanus, Chrysopa, Hematozoida, and others. One of the commonest gadflies which attack cattle and horses is Tabanus borealis. See also cut under Chrysopa.

Gadfly (Tabanus ruficornis), natural size.

Light fly his slumbers, if perchance a flight
Of angry gad-flies fasten on the herd.

Thomson, Summer, l. 409.

2. A common though erroneous name of sundry flies (bot-flies) of the family Estridae and genus Estrus or Hippodermia, belonging to a different series of the great order Diptera from that of gadflies proper. These flies sting animals with their ovipositor, and deposit their eggs in the skin.

3. Figuratively, one who is constantly going about; a mischievous or annoying gadabout.

Harriet may turn gad fly, and never be easy but when she is forming paths.
Richardson, St. Charles Grandison, l. 135.

Local reporters thrusting themselves into the private apartments. . . . So insufferable do the gadflies of journalism become.
New York Tribune, Dec. 16, 1879.

Gadhelic (gád'el-ik), a. and n. [A discriminated form (with generalized sense) of Gaelic, adapted form of Gael. Gaithelach, Ir. Gaoidhlig, Gaelic: see Gaelic.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to that branch of the Celtic race which comprises the Erse of Ireland, the Gaels of Scotland, and the Manx of the Isle of Man, as distinguished from the Cymric branch. See Cymric. Ireland was the first home of the Gadhelic branch, whence it spread to Scotland in the sixth century, a portion of the branch, under the name of Scots, having then settled in Argyll. The Scots ultimately became the dominant race, the Picts, an earlier and probably a Cymric race, being lost in them.

II. n. The language of the Gadhelic branch of the Celtic race, comprising the Erse, Gaelic, and Manx.

gadid (gád'id), n. A fish of the family Gadidae; a gadoid. T. Gill.

Gadidae (gád'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Gadus + -idae.] A family of anacanthine or soft-finned fishes, of the order Pleurophari and suborder Anacanthini, typified by the genus Gadus; the cods. They have subcylindrical bodies, the dorsal and anal fins divergent, the taillets of the caudal fin prominent above and below; and the body conical behind, with nearly median anus and terminal mouth. The Gadidae are the most diverse family of the suborder. The subfamilies are Gadinae, Phocinae, and Lota, the last containing the haddock and the ling. Besides the cod, the haddock, whiting, pollack, and ling are the leading representatives of the family. The name has often been used with greater latitude of definition than that here given, being in the older systems equivalent to the Cuvierian Gadoidae or Gadidae. See cod.

Gadinae (gá'dī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gadus + -inae.] The typical subfamily of anacanthine fishes of the family Gadidae, distinguished by the development of three dorsal and two anal fins, with moderate ventrals; the true cod-fishes. It contains the most important of all food-fishes, as the cod, haddock, pollack, whiting, etc., in the aggregate representing a greater economic value than any other family of fishes. The Gadinae are all marine. See cod under cod.

gadine (gá'dīn), a. and n. [< Gadus + -ine.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the subfamily Gadinae; gadinic.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Gadinae.

The common cod-fish . . . may be . . . defined as a gadine with the lower jaw shutting within the upper, a well-developed barbel, and the anus below the second dorsal fin; the chief shoulder-girdle bone is lamelliform. Stand. Nat. Hist., III, 298.

Gadina (gá'dīn'-ī), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1824), < gadin, a barbarous word, used first by Adanson in the name Lepas gadin, applied by him to a species of this genus from Senegal.] A genus of pulmonate gastropods, typical of the family Gaditidae, having a simple patelliform shell.

Gadina pentagonostoma, dorsal and ventral views. The latter showing the interrupted barbed-shaped pallial impression.

gadinic (gá'dīn'ik), a. [< gadine + -ic.] 1. Derived from codfish: as, gadinic acid.—2. Pertaining to cods or Gadidae; gadoid.

gadinid (gá'dīn'id), n. A gastropod of the family Gaditidae.

Gaditidae (gá'dī-nī'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gadina + -idae.] A family of gastropod mollusks, of the order Pulmonifera and suborder Basommatophora, typified by the genus Gadina, containing species with a limpet-like shell.

Gaditinae (gá'dī-nī'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gadina + -inae.] A family of gastropod mollusks, of the order Pulmonifera and suborder Basommatophora, typified by the genus Gadina, containing species with a limpet-like shell.

gadinin (gá'dī'nin), n. [< gadine + -in.] A provisional name of a plomum formed in the putrefaction of fish-flesh, to which the formula $C_7H_{17}NO_2$ has been given.

Gaditanian (gá'dī-tā'nī-an), a. and n. [< L. Gaditanus, pertaining to Gades, a city in Spain, now called Cádiz.] 1. a. Belonging or relating to Cádiz or ancient Gades in Spain, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. A native of Gades or Cádiz.

Gadite (gá'dīt), a. [< L. Gadus, Cádiz, + -ite.] Of or pertaining to Gades or Cádiz; Gaditanian.

To, here his grave,
Who victor died on Gadite waves.

Scott, Marion, l. 101.

Gadites (gá'dītēz), n. pl. [NL. (prop. F. pl.), < Gadus + -ites.] In McMurtrie's edition of Cuvier's system, the first family of Malacopterygii sub-brachiati; same as Gadoidae.

gadling¹ (gád'ling), n. [< ME. gadling, gadeling, also gading, gadeling (-yng), a fellow (in depreciation or contempt), < AS. gadeling, a comrade, fellow, companion (in the proper sense), = OS. gadling. OHG. gadhing*, gadhinc, a kinsman, MHG. gethinc, a kinsman, a fellow, = Goth. gadhilgins, a cousin, nephew, cf. MHG. gegale, gale, comrade, partner, consort, spouse, G. galle, consort, spouse, husband (fem. gattin, wife), = OS. gagado = AS. gagada, a fellow, associate, = D. gade, a spouse, consort: all from the same source (gad*) as gather and together: see gather. Not connected with *gad*².] A man of humble condition; a fellow; a low fellow; originally (in Anglo-Saxon), a fellow, associate, or companion, in a good sense, but later used in reproach. Compare similar uses of fellow and companion.

They . . . come to him armed on steels, . . .
And fifteen thousand of foot ladders . . .
And all stalworth and boldness.

King Alisaunder, l. 1192 (Webster's Metr. Rom.).

Crests eurs not he have, that clepeth me gadlyng!

I am no worse gadlyng, ne no worse wight,
But both of a lady, and gotten of a knight.

Tale of Gamelyn, l. 100.

gadling² (gád'ling), a. and n. [Appar. a particular use of *gadling*¹, taken as if < gad² + -ling.] 1. a. A vagabond; one who gads about.

The wandering gadling in the summer tide

Went, The Jealous Man.

II. a. Given to gadding about; gadding.

gadling³, n. [< gad¹ + -ling.] Same as gad¹.

gad-nail (gád'nāl), n. A long stout nail. Hall's Well, [Prov. Eng.]

gadoid (gád'oid), a. and n. [< NL. Gadoides, < Gadus + Gr. eidos, form.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Gadidae or Gadoidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Gadidae; a gadid. Also gadean.

Gadoidae (gá'doi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gadus + -oidae.] A superfamily of anacanthine teleostean fishes. The technical characters are: the opercular portion of the skull longer than the posterior portion; the cranial cavity widely open in front; the supra-occipital bone well developed, horizontal, and cariniform behind; the exoccipitals contracted forward and overlying the supra-occipital; their condyles distant and feebly developed; the hypocranoid entire; and the hypocranoid with its inferior process convergent toward the preopercula. It includes the families Gadidae, Morichthidae, Basilichthyidae, and Macruridae.

Gadoides (gá'doi'dēz), n. pl. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Gadus + -oides.] In Cuvier's system of classification, a family of subbrachiote male-copterygian fishes, including all the symmetrical forms of the order, and contrasted with the flatfishes. It embraces the Gadidae, Macruridae, Brotulidae, and other families of recent ichthyologists. Also Gadoides, Gadites.

gadolinite (gád'ō-līn-īt), n. [Named from Johan Gadolin, a Finnish chemist (1760-1852).] A mineral, a silicate of the yttrium and cerium metals, containing also beryllium and iron. It occurs usually in masses of a blackish or greenish-black color, vitreous luster, and conchoidal fracture; less frequently it is found in crystals resembling those of calcite in form and angles.

gadolinium (gád'ō-līn'i-um), n. [NL., after Johan Gadolin: see gadolinite.] A supposed new element found with yttrium in gadolinite.

Gadopsidae (gá'dop'sī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gadopsis + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, having the form of a cod, but the anterior portion of the dorsal and anal fins formed by spines. The species are inhabitants of the fresh waters of Australia.

Gadopsis (gá'dop'sīs), n. [NL., < Gadus + Gr. ops, appearance.] The typical genus of the family Gadopsidae, containing such species as G. gracilis and G. marmoratus: so called from their resemblance to the Gadidae.

gadrise (gád'rīz), n. [< gad¹ + rise².] The European dogwood, Cornus sanguinea, and spindle-tree, Euonymus Europaea.

gadsman (gád'z'mān), n.; pl. gadsmen (-mēn). [Sc. gadsman, also gadman; < gad, Sc. also gud, poss. goud's, + man: see gad¹ and goad.] One who drives horses or oxen at the plow.

For men, I've three mischievous boys, . . .
A gadsman sure, a thrasher t'other.

Burns, The Inventory.

gadsot, interj. [Var. of gad³, prob. mixed with catso.] An interjection of surprise: same as gadlooks.

Gadsot they come by appointment.

Sheridan, The Critic, l. 1.

Gadso these great men use our's house and their time as if it were their own property. Well, it's once and away.

Scott, Antiquary, xxi.

gad-staff (gád'stáf), n. A gad or goad.

Scho loutt oxen aucht or nyne,
And hant aye gad-staf in hir hand.

Wgt of Auchtermuchty (Child's Ballads, VIII, 112).

gad-steel (gád'stēl), n. [< gad² + steel. Cf. AS. gād-ææn, a gad or goad, lit. 'goad-iron'.] Flemish steel: so named from its being wrought in gads or wedge-shaped ingots.

gad-stick (gád'stik), n. An ox-whip; a goad.

Gadus (gá'dus), n. [NL., a codfish, < Gr. γάδος, the same as γός, L. acellus, a certain fish.] The typical genus of gadines or Gadinae. The common cod is Gadus morhua or Morhua vulgaris. The genus was formerly continuous with the family Gadidae, but now includes only the true cods, the haddock, hake, tom cods, etc., being referred to other genera. Morhua is a synonym. See cod under cod.

gadwale (gád'wāl), n. Same as gadwall.

gadwall (gád'wāl), n. [Also gadcal, gadwale; spelled gadwall in Willughby (1676); gadall in Merrett (Pinax Rerum Nat. Brit., 1687); also gadwell, accompanied by an erroneous derivation ('from gad, to walk about, and wall, Webster's Dict.). The origin is unknown. A similar terminal syllable appears in the name of another bird, the criticall, but there is nothing to show a connection.] The gray duck or gray, Anas strepera or Chauliastur strepera, a fresh-water duck of the subfamily Anatinae and family Anatidae, abundant in the northern hemisphere. It is nearly as large as the mallard. The plumage of the male is mostly variegated with blackish and whitish crescentic markings; the greater coverts are black, the middle coverts chestnut, the speculum pure white, the bill blue-black, and the feet yellowish with dusky webs. The gadwall is an excellent table-duck, the most of the Anatinae, and is generally diffused in Europe, Asia, and America. (Cuvier's gadwall, C. canad. is a second species from the Fanning Islands. See cut under Chauliastur.)

gadwell (gád'wel), n. Same as gadwall.

The gadwell, the pin-tail duck, the widgown.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 224.

gad-whip (gad'hwip), n. Same as gad-stick. [Lincolnshire, Eng.] gadwhorn, interj. Same as gadwhork. Buckingham, Berkshire.
gadwhork (gad'zork), interj. [Appar. a corruption of God's (that is, Christ's) works, with ref.
to the nails with which Christ was fixed to the cross, and which often appear in early oaths.]
A minced oath. Also zooks.

But the Money, Gadwhork, must be paid in an hour.
Prior, Down-Hall, at 8.

gae (gä), v. t.; pret. gaird, pp. gaen. A Scotch form of go.

If ye be thinking of the wreck-wood that the callants brought in yesterday, there was six ounces of it gaed to boll ville, 1843), so called from the shrilling or stridulation of these insects, < Skt. gāyana, singing, < √ gā, sing.] A genus of Asiatic homopterous insects, of the family Cicadidae, of which about six species are described, having opaque bands on the wing-covers, and the abdomen either red or black with yellow spots.

gae-down, gae-down (gä'down, -dōn), n. [Sc.]
1. The act of swallowing.—2. A guzzling- or drinking-match.

He sent Jamie Grilve the keeper, and sicken a day as we had w' the fourmarts and the tods, and sicken a blithe gae-down as we had again a cu! Scott, Guy Mannering.

Gackwar, n. See Gackwar.

Gael (gäl), n. [Gael, Gaidheal (contr. Gael) = Ir. Gaidheal (with dh now silent), OIr. Goidel, a Gael, formerly equiv. also to 'Irishman,' = W. gwyddel, an Irishman.] A Scottish Highlander or Celt.

The Gael around him threw
His graceful plaid of varied hue.
Scott, L. of the L., v. 2

Gael. An abbreviation of Gaelic.

Gaelic (gä'lik), a. and n. [Formerly also Gaelic, with accented term. -ic, < Gael. Gaidhealach (with silent dh, and so sometimes written Gaelach, Gaelach), Gaelic, < Gaidheal, a Gael, Highlander; see Gael. As a noun, cf. Gael. Gaidheallig, Gailig, Gaelig = Ir. Gaidhealg, the Gaelic language.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Gael, a Celtic race inhabiting the Highlands of Scotland; as, the Gaelic language.

II. n. The language of the Celts inhabiting the Highlands of Scotland. See Gaidheal.

Gaertnerian (gärt-né'ri-an), a. [Gärtner (see def.) = E. Gardner, gardener] + -ian.] Pertaining to the German anatomist and botanist Joseph Gärtner (1732-91). — Gaertnerian canal, the duct of Gärtner. See canal.

gaet (gät), n. A Scotch spelling of gait, gate.

gaff (gaf), n. [ME. gaffe, a hook, harpoon, <
OF. gaffe, an iron hook, a harpoon, F. gaffe, a boat-hook, gaff, = Pr. gaf = Sp. gafa, a hook, gaff. Of Celtic origin: Ir. gaf, gafa, a hook; cf.
W. gaffe, a grasp, grapple, a sort of dung-fork. Cf.
E. gaffe, AS. gaff, a fork, < Ir. gabhal, a fork, gabhal, a spear, lance, = Gael. gabhal, more properly gabhal, a forked support, a prop, = W. gaff, a fork. To the same source is referred gabhl,

W. caffal, cael, get, obtain, have, caffal, hold, get, grasp, = L. capere, take: see capere, capa- cius, etc.] 1. A sharp, strong iron hook, like a large fish-hook without a barb, inserted into or otherwise attached to a wooden handle of convenient length, used especially for landing large fish, as salmon, pike, bass, or the like, after they have been hooked on the line. Also called gaff- hook. The angler's gaff is now usually made in detachable parts, the large hook, about three inches across the head, being fitted into the handle by a screw. A similar instrument is used by whalers in handling blubber, and a two-pronged gaff is employed in some places, as at Cape Ann, in handling ice or salted fish.

Well, saint Donaluk with tht langstaffe;
Hit is at the ovr end enkid as a gaffe.

ter, Massachusetts, about 1823, but abandoned after some ten years' use. To bring to gaff, to draw (a hooked fish) with the line within reach of the gaff.

When a fish is beat and is being brought to gaff, much caution is necessary. Quarterly Rec., CXXXI, 351

Two-pronged gaff. See def. 1

gaff (gaf), v. [gaff, n.] I. trans. To hook with a gaff; land by means of a gaff: as, to gaff a fish.

Sometimes also it happens that nearly every fish that rises to the fly is gaffed. Quarterly Rec., CXXXI, 351

II. intrans. To use the gaff: as, to gaff for an angler.

gaffer (gaf'er), n. [Origin obscure.] In Great Britain, a theater of the lowest class; the admission to which is generally a penny; a cheap and loosely conducted place of amusement, where singing and dancing take place.

The penny theatres, or "penny gaffs" chiefly found on the Surrey side of the river, were little better than hot beds of vice, and were finally closed by the police in March, 1838. First Year of a Sinner's Rem., p. 212

gaffer (gaf'er), n. [gaff + -er.] One who gaffs fish; an angler's assistant who with a gaff secures the fish caught. Also gaffman.

gaffer (gaf'er), n. [E. dial. a further contr. of graffer, a dial. contr. of grandfather: see grand- father. Cf. gammer, contr. of grandmother.] 1.
An old man; originally a rustic term of respect, used as a title; later applied familiarly to any old man of rustic condition.

For gaffer Treadwell told us, by the bye,
Excessive sorrow is exceeding dry Gay, Shepherd's Week, Friday, l. 151.

And soon the loving pair agreed
By this same system to proceed
And through the parish with their how-d'ye, Go to each gaffer, and each goodly vice, < gafol, tribute, rent, + land, land.] In Anglo-Saxon law, property subject to gafolgild, or liable to be taxed.

gafol-yrthet, n. [AS., < gafol, tribute, rent, + eorthe, earth; see earth.] In Anglo-Saxon law, the plowing, by way of rent, of strips, generally three acres in area, and the sowing of them by the gebur, from his own barn, with the subsequent reaping and carrying of the crop to the lord's barn. Seebohm.

gag (gag), v.; pret. and pp. gagged; ppr. gag- ging. [Early mod. E. gagge, < ME. gaggen, gag; prob. imitative of the sound of choking.
Cf. gaggle, cackle, etc.] I. trans. 1. To stop up the mouth or throat of (a person) with some solid body, so as to prevent him from speaking;
hence, to silence by authority or by violence;
restrain from freedom of speech.

Gag him, (that) we may have his silence.
H. Jonson, Postaster, v. 1.

While our Spanish licensing gags the English prose never so severely. Milton, Arcopagitica, p. 20.

2. To pry or keep open by means of a gag.
Months gagged to such a wideness.
Forster, De Laundibus (Frank, ed. Gregor), xxi.

3. To cause to heave with nausea.—4. To stop or choke up, as a valve or passage.

The men who gagged the valve knew quite well what they were about, and took their chance.
The Engineer, LXV, 408.

We had backed slowly to increase the distance; with furious flies and a gagged engine working at the full stroke of the pistons. The Century, XXXVI, 431.

5. To introduce interpolations into; as, to gag a part. [Stage slang.]

Well, Miss Keene, I have read the part very carefully, and if you will let me gag it and do what I please with it, I will undertake it, though it is terribly bad.
Sothern, quoted in Lester Wallack's Memories.

6. To play jokes upon; joke; guy. [Slang.]
= Syn. 1. Gag, Muzzle, Muffle, with To gag is to silence by thrusting something into the mouth and securing it in place. To muzzle a dog, or other creature having a projecting mouth, is to muzzle the mouth and nose (muzzle) in a framework called a muzzle in order to prevent him from biting or eating. Both gag and muzzle are sometimes used figuratively for the act of silencing effectively by moral compulsion, gag implying also roughness or severity in the performance, as, a muzzled press; to gag a public speaker by threats of violence. To muzzle is primarily concerned by wrapping up, but the word has a secondary use to express the deadening of sound, by wrapping (as an ear) or otherwise (as a drum).

The time was not yet come when eloquence was to be gagged, and reason to be bewitched.
Macaulay, Macmillan.

My gagget muzzled.
Let it should bite its master. Shak. W. T., l. 2
In his mantle gagging up his face great Gullat full Shak. A. C., III, 2.

II. intrans. 1. To ratch; heave with nausea.
—2. To interpolate words of one's own into one's part; said of an actor. [Stage slang.]

Little skills in what are professionally known as "patter" allusions to the subject of re-lived with loud applause, and the same vocalist gags in the regular business like a man inspired. Encyc. Brit., XXXIX.

The leading actors will be nervous, uncertain in their words, and disposed to interpolate or gag until their memories are refreshed by the prompter. Cornhill Mag.

gag (gag), n. [Early mod. E. gagge; < gag, v.] 1.
Something thrust into the mouth or throat to prevent speech or outcry; hence, any vic-lent or authoritative suppression of freedom of speech.

1. He felt, pull out his gag, he will choke also.
Fletcher and Shirley, Night Walker, II. 5.

Imagine, if you can, his indignant eloquence had England offered to put a gag upon his lips.
W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 2.

2. A mouthful which produces nausea and retching, or threatens with choking.

1. Has recorded the repugnance of the school to gags, or the lot of Irish beef boiled.
Lamb, Christ's Hospital.

3. An apparatus or device for distending the jaws, such as is used in various surgical operations; hence, anything used to pry or keep open the jaws.

Musicians in England have used to put gagges in children's mouths, that they might pronounce distinctly.
See T. Wilson, Art of Rhetoric, p. 223.

The eyelid is kept open with the gag of lust and envy.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 73.

4. In cut-nutting, a chip of wood in a sinking pit-bottom or sump.
Gresley, [Eng.]—5. An interpolation introduced by an actor into his part, whether in accordance with custom or with his own fancy. [Stage slang.]

You see the performance consisted all of gag. I don't suppose anybody knows what the words are in the piece.
Mushkin.

1. I have heard some very passable gags at the Marionette, but the real comedia a braccio no longer exists, and its familiar and invariable characters perform written plays.
Hansell, Venetian Life, v.

6. A joke, especially a practical joke; a farce; a hoax. [Slang.]

gagatol, n. [ME. gagate, also as gagates, an agate; see agate.] Agate. Fuller.

gagel (gaj), n. [ME. gape, a gape (in challenge), < OF. gape, F. gape, a gape, pawn, pledge, security, pl. gages, wages, = Pr. gajge, gajge, gajge, = Sp. gaje = Pg. gaje = It. gaggio, a gaje, pledge, wage, reward, < ML. radium, radium (also gajum, after OF.), a pledge, < Goth. wadi = OHG. weti, wetti, ML. rad, rad = AN. wedd, E. wed, a pledge, = L. rad (rad), a surety, bail (a person), whence radimontum, a promise secured by bail, security, recognition. See wage, n., a doublet of gagel, and wed, n., the native E. form.] 1. A pledge or pawn; a movable chattel laid down or given as security for the performance of some act or the fulfillment of some condition.

And if there by any man will saye (except you put some) that I would any thinge other than well to you or to your people, here is my gagge to the contrary.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. 15.

Considering also with howe many benefices and spechall gages of howe we are bound both to God and Christ.
J. Upland, On Rom. viii.

The sheriff is commanded to attach him, by taking gag. This is, certain of his goods, which he shall forfeit if he does not appear.
Blackstone, Com., III. 165.

2. The act of pledging, or the state of being pledged; pawn; security.

His credit he did often leave
In gag for his gay Masters hopelesse debt.
Spenser, Mother Hub Tale, I. 865.

I was faine to borrow these spurs; I have left my gown in gag for them.
R. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, II. 2.

3. Anything thrown down as a token of challenge to combat; hence, challenge. Formerly it was customary for the challenger to cast on the ground some article, most commonly a glove or gauntlet, which was taken up by the acceptor of the challenge. See gauntlet.

Pale trembling coward, there I throw my gag, Disclaiming here the kindest of the king.
Shak., Rich. II., I. 1.

There take my gag; behold, I offer it
To him that first accused him in this cause.
Fletcher, tr. of Dumas's Godfrey of Boulogne, v. 38.

To lay to gag, to leave in pawn. Nares

For learned Collin leas his pipes to a gag,
And is to favre gone a pilgrimage.
Ben Jonson, Shepherd's Week, I.

gagel (gaj), v. t.; pret. and pp. gaged, ppr. gaging. [ME. gager, F. gager = Pr. gajgar, gajgar, gajgar, pledge, < ML. radarius, pledge; from the noun; see gagel, n. Cf. engage, disengage.] 1. To pledge, pawn, or stake; give or deposit as a gag or security; wage or wager. [Archaic.]

See John Philipot, citizen of London, demands great commendations who at his own money recovered the army which the catholics had gaged for their victuals, more than a thousand in number.
Stone, Rich. II., an. 1394.

Against the which a moiety competent
Was gaged by our king.

(d) In tape-measuring, a piece of hard wood or polished steel, variously notched, used to adjust the dimensions, slopes, etc., of the various sorts of letters. (e) Same as gagel. (f) See also caliber-gage, center-gage, gaging-rod, gaging-rod, rain-gage, steam-gage, wind-gage, and phrases below.

2. A standard or determinate dimension, quantity, or amount; a fixed or standard measurement. (a) In railroad construction, the width or distance between the rails, as, standard broad or narrow gagel. The standard gagel is 4 feet 8 1/2 inches. A greater distance between the rails constitutes a freight-gage, a less distance a mini-gage. (b) In building, the length of a state of the below the lap. (c) In plastering, (1) The quantity of plaster of Paris used with common plaster to a certain setting. (2) The composition of plaster of Paris and other materials used in finishing plastered ceilings, moldings, etc. (d) In the weaving, the fineness of the fabric. It depends upon the number of threads or hanks in the comb and consequently upon the number of hanks in an inch of the double tier. (e) The diameter or size of the bore of a shot gun.

3. Naut.: (a) The depth to which a vessel sinks in the water. (b) The position of a ship with reference to another vessel and to the wind.

When to the windward she is said to have the gagel-gage: when to the leeward, the lee-gage.

1. I have no gag, but a whole gag
Of this I bowe to you.
Browne, Jovial Crew, II.

2. To measure in respect to capability, power, character, or behavior; take cognizance of the capacity, capability, or power of; appraise; estimate; as, to gagel a person's character very accurately.

Nay, but I bar to night, you shall not gagel me
By what we do to night.
Shak., M. of V., II. 2.

3. In needlework, especially dressmaking, to pucker in parallel rows by means of gathering threads, either for ornament or to hold the material firmly in place.

gagel, gagel (gaj), n. [ME. gagel, F. gage, F. gage, a gagel, measuring-rod; ML. gagula, gagula, gagula, the standard measure of a wine-cask. See gagel, v.] 1. A standard of measure; an instrument for determining the dimensions, capacity, quantity, force, etc., of anything; hence, any standard of comparison or estimation; measure in general; as, a gagel for the thickness of wires; to take the gagel of a man's ability.

Timothy . . . had prepared a gagel, by which they (servants) were to be measured.
Catholus, J. in bull.

Bisecting gage, a gage formed by a bar carrying two heads or cheeks connected by two arms of equal length, forming a toggle-joint, at which a pencil or scribe-awl is placed. The pencil or awl is thus at equal distances from the cheeks at whatever gage they may be set. — Catheter-gage. See catheter. — Centering-gage. A gage for fixing the middle point of an axle. (Car-Builders' Dict.) — Difference-gage, a gage adapted for testing the slight difference of diameter commonly required between parts which are to be fitted into each other.

as the slight excess of diameter in a bearing in which an axle is to revolve, or the slight shortness of diameter in a socket into which a shaft is to be forced so as to fit tightly.

— External gage, a male or plug gage. See plug-and-collar gage. — Female gage. Same as internal gage. — Flat gage, a gage of which the two sides are made in true parallel planes, used for testing the correctness of the notches in wire gages. — Floating gage, a gage indicating the height of the surface of a liquid by the agency of a float which rises and falls with the liquid. — Hydraulic gage. See hydraulic. — Internal gage, a female or collar gage. See plug-and-collar gage. — Male gage. Same as external gage. — Mercurial gage, a pressure-gage in which a column of mercury is used to indicate the pressure; a mercurial level. — Plug-and-collar gage, a pair of contact-measuring gages, external and internal, accurately adjusted to each other, and used respectively for testing internal and external diameters in cylindrical work. — Router gage. See router. — Siphon-gage, a short bent tube, one branch of which is connected with the receiver, the other being closed at the top and filled with mercury when the process begins. As the pressure diminishes the mercury falls, and the degree of exhaustion is measured by the difference in its height in the two branches. This would become zero if a perfect vacuum were produced. — Star-gage. (a) A count of stars visible in a powerful telescope, within a certain area, in a given part of the heavens. (b) An instrument for measuring the diameter of the bore of a cannon at any part of its length. It consists of a graduated brass tube having at one end a head from which radiate two fixed and two movable steel points. A slider in the graduated tube pushes outward the movable points as may be necessary. — Stepped gage, a form of male or plug gage in which a series of external gages are combined, each projecting like a step beyond that next in front of it. — V-gage, a form of wire gage in which the notches are tapering or V-shaped, the slider of the notches being graduated. Such gages are sometimes made with but a single notch of large size.

— Wire-gage, a gage for measuring the thickness of wire and sheet metal. It is usually a plate of steel having round the edge a series of notches of standard opening.

gagel (gaj), n. [From a personal name; see the extract.] A name given to several varieties of plum: as, the green gagel, golden gagel, transparent gagel, etc.

gos of Africa, of the size of a squirrel and upward. One of the best-known species is the squirrel-lemur, G. senegalensis, also called Odocoileus galago, extensively distributed in Africa; the thick-tailed galago is G. crassicaudatus, about a foot long, the tail 16 inches; others are G. mahali and G. demissa. The larger and smaller forms of the genus are sometimes separated under the names Odocoileus and Odocoileus respectively. One of the least of the latter is G. murina, only about 4 inches long.

2. [l. c.; pl. galagos (-gōz).] A species or individual of the genus Galago or subfamily Galagininae. See gum-animal.

galam butter (gá'lam but'ēr), n. See vegetable butters, under butter.

galanga (ga-lang'gā), n. [ML. and NL.: see galangal.] Same as galangal.

galangal, galangale (ga-lang'gal or gal'an-gal, gal'in-gā), n. [ME. galingale, galynale, etc. (found once in AS. galangar (cf. OD. galiguen, ML. galigan, MHG. galgant, galgan, galgān, galgant), but the ME. forms follow OF.), < OF. galingul, also garingal; early mod. E. also galange, < OF. galange, galange, galangal, or cypress or aromatic root. F. (after ML.) galanga = Sp. Pg. It. galanga = Dan. galange, < ML. galanga = MGr. γάγγα, < Ar. khalanjān, kholinjān = Pers. khuljān, khawālinjān, < (Chinese) Ko (or Kao) hang-kung, galangal, i. e., mild ginger (hang-kung, < hang, mild, & kung, ginger) from Ko or Kao, also called Kao-chow-fu, a prefecture in the province of Kiang-tung (Canton), where galangal is chiefly produced. This word is interesting as being in E. the oldest word, in AS. the only word, of Chinese origin, except silk, which may be ultimately Chinese.) 1. A dried rhizome brought from China and used in medicine (but much less than formerly), being an aromatic stimulant of the nature of ginger. It was formerly used as a seasoning for food, and was one of the ingredients of galantine. The drug is mostly produced by Alpinia officinarum, a flag like scitamineous plant, with stems about 4 feet high, clothed with narrow lanceolate leaves, and terminating in short simple racemes of handsome white flowers. The greater galangal is the root of Kemipera thalanga. Poudre-marchant tart and balsam. Chaucer, Gen. Prolog to C. T., l. 381.

2. A sedge, Cyperus longus, with an aromatic tuberous root. Also called English galangal.

The date Was seen far inland, and the yellow down Border'd with palm, and many a winding vale And meadow, set with slender galangale. Tennyson, Lotus Eaters.

galanget, n. [See galangal.] Same as galangal.

Galange (rometh) from China, Chant. Gen. & Cochin. Galangal (Leycester), II. 277.

Galanthus (ga-lan'thus), n. [NL., short for galactanthus, < Gr. γάλα (gálakt-), milk, + άνθος, flower.] A small genus of Amaryllidaceae, represented by the well-known snowdrop, G. nivalis. They are herbaceous plants with bulbous roots, narrow leaves, and drooping white bell-shaped flowers of six segments, the three outer being concave and spreading, and the three inner erect and shorter. There are four species, natives of middle and southern Europe and the Caucasus.

galantine (gal'an-tin), n. [ME. galantyne, galentyne, < OF. galentine, F. galantine, < ML. galatina for galatina, jelly; see gelatin, and cf. G. gellerte, jelly.] 1. A sauce in cookery made of sopped bread and spices. Halliwell.

No man yit in the morder spices ground To [for] clare us to same of galantyn.

Chaucer, Forner Age, l. 16.

With a sponge take out galentine, & lay it upon the brede with reed wyne & poudre of ymaginon. Baboys Book (E. E. F. S.), p. 261.

2. A dish of veal, chicken, or other white meat, boned, stuffed, tied tightly, and boiled with spices and vegetables. It is served cold with its own jelly.

If the cold fowl and salad failed, there must be galantine of veal with ham to fall back on. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII, 4.

galanty-show, n. See gallanty-show.

Galapagian (gal-a-pā'ji-an), a. Pertaining to the Galapagos islands, an archipelago in the Pacific ocean about 600 miles west of Ecuador, to which country they belong.

galapago (gal-a-pā'gō), n. [Sp., a tortoise.] A military engine of defense; a tortoise, testudo, or mantlet: the Spanish word, sometimes used in English. Also spelled galipago.

There were galapagos or tortoises, also, being great wooden shields, covered with hides, to protect the assailants and those who undermined the walls. Irving, Granada, p. 374.

galapectite (gal-a-pēk'tit), n. [< Gr. γάλα, milk, + πᾶν, congealed, curdled (verbal adj.

of πᾶν, fix, fasten, congeal, curdle), + -itis.] In mineral., a variety of halloysite.

galapee-tree (gal'a-pē-trē), n. The Scaevola taccada Brown, a small arborescent tree of the West Indies, with a nearly simple stem bearing a head of large digitate leaves.

Galatea (gal-a-tē'a), n. [L., < Gr. Γαλάτεια, a fem. name.] 1. In zool., a name variously applied.

(a) In the form Galathea, by Bruguière (1792), to a genus of bilvalve mollusks, of the family Cyrenidae, characteristic of Africa, containing about 20 species, such as G. rectus. In this sense also spelled Galathra, Galatou. Also called Euporia, and by other names. (b) In the form Galathea, by Fabricius (1793), to a genus of crustaceans. See Galathea. (c) [l. c.] In entom., to the half mourning butterfly, Papilio galatæa. 2. [l. c.] A striped cotton material. Dict. of Needlework.

Galathea (gal-a-thē'a), n. [NL. (Bruguière, 1792; Fabricius, 1793), improp. for Galatæa.] 1. In conch., same as Galathea (a).—2. The typical genus of macrurous crustaceans of the family Galatheidæ. G. strigosa is an example.

Galatheidæ (gal-a-thē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Galathea + -idæ.] A family of macrurous decapod crustaceans, having a large broad abdomen, well-developed caudal swimmerets, the first pair of legs chelate, the last pair weak and reduced; typified by the genus Galathea. Properly written Galatridæ.

Galatian (gá-lā'shan), a. and n. [< L. Galatia, < Gr. Γαλατία, the country of the Galatæ, Gr. Γαλάται, a later word for Κελτοί, Celts, connected with Γάλλοι, Gauls; see Gaul.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Galatia, an ancient inland division of Asia Minor, lying south of Bithynia and Paphlagonia, conquered and colonized by the Gauls in the third century B. C.

II. n. l. A native or an inhabitant of Galatia in Asia Minor.

O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth? Gal. III. 1.

2. pl. The shortened title of the Epistle to the Galatians. (See below.) Abbreviated Gal.—Epistle to the Galatians, one of the epistles of the Apostle Paul, written to the Galatian churches probably about A. D. 56. Its chief contents are a vindication of Paul's authority as an apostle, a plea for the principle of justification by faith, and a concluding exhortation.

Galax (gá'laks), n. [NL., appar. based on Gr. γάλα, milk.] A genus of plants, referred to the natural order Diapensiaceae, of a single species, G. aphylla, found in open woods from Virginia to Georgia. It is a stemless evergreen, with round cordate leaves and a tall scape bearing a slender raceme of numerous small white flowers.

Galaxias (ga-lak'si-as), n. [NL., < Gr. γαλαξίας, a kind of fish, prob. the lamprey; see Galaxy.] 1. A genus of fishes, typical of the family Galaxiidae. The species are peculiar to the fresh waters of the southern hemisphere. Curier, 1817.—2. A subgenus or section of land-shells, typified by Helix globulus. Beck, 1837.

galaxiidian (gal-ak-sid'i-an), n. A fish of the family Galaxiidae; a galaxiid. Sir J. Richardson.

Galaxiidae (gal-ak-sid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Galaxias + -idae.] A family of isospondylous fishes, superficially resembling the Salmonidae. They have an elongated scaleless body, the margin of the upper jaw formed chiefly by the short intermaxillaries, the dorsal fin opposite to and resembling the anal, few pyloric appendages, no adipose fin, and no oviduct. The family contains about 12 species of small fishes of trout-like aspect, inhabiting New Zealand, Australia, and South America. Also Galaxie, Galaxidae, Galaxiada.

Galaxy (gal'ak-si), n. [ME. galaxie, < OF. galaxie, F. galaxie = Sp. Pg. galaxia = It. galassia, < L. galaxias, the Milky Way (in pure L. via lactea or circulus lacteus), < Gr. γαλαξίας (see galaktos, circle), the Milky Way, also the milkstone, and a kind of fish, < γάλα (gálakt-), milk; see galactic.] 1. In astron., the Milky Way, a luminous band extending around the heavens. It is produced by myriads of stars, into which it is resolved by the telescope. It divides into two great branches, which remain apart for a distance of 150° and then reunite; there are also many smaller branches. At one point it spreads out very widely, exhibiting a fan like expanse of interlacing branches nearly 90° broad; this terminates abruptly and leaves a kind of gap. At several points are seen dark spots in the midst of some of the brightest portions.

"Now," quoth he tho, "cast up thy ye, Se yonder lo, the Galaxie— The whiche men clepe the Milky waye, For hit ys white: and somme, parlye, Callen byt Wallynge strete."

Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1264.

A broad and simple rood, whose dust is gold,
And pavement stars, as stars to these appear,
Seen in the galaxy, that milky way,
Which nightly, as a circling zone, thou seest

Hence—2. [l. e.; pl. galaxies (-siz).] Any assemblage of splendid, illustrious, or beautiful persons or things.

Often has my mind hung with fondness and admiration over the crowded, yet clear and luminous, galaxies of images, diffused through the works of Bishop Taylor. Parr.

Galba (gal'ba), n. [NL., < L. galba, a small worm, the ash-borer.] 1. In zool.: (a) A genus made to include such species of Limnaea as L. palustris. Schrank, 1803. (b) A genus of Strophodonts. Hayden, 1826. (c) A supposed genus of worms. Johnston, 1834. (d) A genus of sternoxia beetles, of the family Eucnemidae, having a few species, all of the Malay archipelago.—2. [l. e.] The wood of Calophyllum calaba, a large tree of Trinidad. It is strong and durable, and one of the best woods of the region.

Galbalcyrrhynchus (gal-bal-si-ring'kus), n. [NL. (Des Murs, 1845), intended to signify a jacamar with a bill like a kingfisher's, < Galbula + alecyron, kingfisher, + (Gr. pyrros, bill).] A genus of Galbulidae, having the characters of Galbula, but a short, nearly even tail, as in Kingfisher Jacamar (Galbalcyrrhynchus leucotis).

Brachygalba, of 12 feathers, and a comparatively stout bill; the kingfisher jacamars. There is but one species, G. leucotis, which is long of a chestnut color with dark wings and tail, and white ears and bill, inhabiting the region of the upper Amazon. Also written Galbalcyrrhynchus.

galban (gal'ban), n. [ME. galbane = G. galban, galben, < L. galbanum: see galbanum.] Same as galbanum. [Now seldom used.]

galbanum (gal'ban-um), n. [Also rarely galban, q. v.; = F. galbanum = Fr. galbani, galba = Sp. galbano = Yg. It. galbano, < L. galbanum, LL. also galbanus and chalcane, (Gr. γαλβαν, < Heb. khelbani, galbanum, < khālab, be fat; cf. khālab, milk.)] A gum resin obtained from species of Ferula, especially F. galbaniflua and F. rubricaulis, of the desert regions of Persia. It occurs in the form of translucent tears, and has a peculiar aromatic odor and a disagreeable alliacious taste. It is used in medicine as a stimulating expectorant and as an ingredient in plasters.

Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbanum, . . . thou shalt make it a perfume. Ex. xxx. 34, 35.

galbe (galb), n. [F., contour, sweep, curve, etc., OF. galbe, also garbe, a garb, comeliness, gracefulness, > E. garb, q. v.] In art, the general outline or form of any rounded object, as a head or vase; especially, in architecture, the curved form of a column, a Doric capital, or other similar feature.

galbula (gal'by-la), n. [L., dim. of galbina, some small bird, perhaps the yellow oriole (< galbus, yellow, of Teut. origin, G. gelb, yellow: see yellow), a different reading of galgulus, some small bird, the wren.] 1. The classical name of some yellow bird of Europe, supposed to be the golden oriole, and the technical specific name of this oriole, Oriolus galbula. The name was also applied by Möhring in 1773 to a South American jacamar, and by Linnaeus in 1758 to the Baltimore oriole, Icterus galbula. See cut under oriole.

2. [cap.] A genus of jacamars, established by Brisson in 1760, typical of the family Galbulidae. There are nine South American species of which G. viridis is a characteristic example. See cut under jacamar.

galbuli, n. Plural of galbula.
Galbulid (gal'by-lid), n. A bird of the family Galbulidae; a jacamar.

Galbulidae (gal-bū'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Galbula + -idae.] A family of fissirostral syngnathiform non-passerine neotropical birds; the jacamars. It is characterized by the absence of the alula or accessory femorocarpal muscles, a nude elyodon; large eyes; two carotids; one pair of intrinsic azygous muscles; after-shafted plumage; 10 primaries, of which the first is short; 10 or 12 rectrices; lashed eyelids; operculate nostrils, bare of feathers; rectal vibrissae; bill long, generally straight, slender, and acute; the feet feeble, with toes in pairs (in one genus the feet three-toed), the second toe united to the third as far as the middle of the second phalanx; and tail partly or imperfectly scutellate. The Galbulidae have somewhat the aspect and habit of kingfishers, with which they were formerly associated; their nearest relatives are the puff birds (Bucconidae), and next the bee-eaters (Micropodidae) and rollers (Cuculidae). There are 18 species and 6 genera: Protonotus, Galbula, Brachygalba, Jacamaralaima, Galbalcyrrhynchus, and Jacamarops. See jacamar, and cut under Galbalcyrrhynchus.

Galbuline (gal-bū'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Galbula + -inae.] A subfamily of Galbulidae, the jacamars proper, representing the whole of the family excepting the genus Jacamarops. The term was formerly equivalent to Galbulidae. P. L. Schater. See cut under jacamar.

galbulus (gal'by-lus), n. [pl. galbuli (-li).] [L., the nut of the cypress-tree.] In bot., a spheroidal cone formed of thickened petaloid scales with a narrow base, as in the cypress, or berry like with fleshy coherent scales, as in the juniper. See cut under Cupressus.

gale (gāl), v. [ME. galen, sing. cry, croak, < AS. galan (pret. gal, pp. galen), sing. = OS. galan = OHG. galan, sing. = Lecl. gala, sing. chant, crow, = Sw. gala = Dan. gal, crow. A deriv. of this verb appears in comp. nightingale, q. v., and prob., more remotely, in gale.] 1. intrans. To sing.—2. To cry; to croak; to croak. Hence—3. Of a person, to "croak"; talk.

Now telleth forth, though that the somonour gale. Chaucer, Froth a Tale, l. 38.

galea (gā'le-ā), n.; pl. galeae (-ē). [L., a helmet.] 1. A helmet, or something resembling a helmet in shape or position. (a) [cap.] In zool., a genus of toadstool, sea-urchins, or a kind of galeate form. (b) In entom., an appendage of the stipes of the maxilla of some insects, as distinguished from the labella, another appendage of the same gnathite.

Under Surface of Head of Tumblebug (Cephus cinctus), about four times natural size. 1, galea; 2, palpus; 3, labella; 4, subgalea; 5, maxillary palp; 6, stipes.

Thus, in the cockroach the galea is soft, rounded, and possibly sensory in function, while the labella is a hard curved blade, serrate and spinose. See labrum.

The extremity of the maxilla is often terminated by two divisions or lobes of which the outer, in the Orthoptera, is termed the galea.

In Cuvier's Règne Anim. (tr. of 1840), p. 474.

(c) In ornith., a frontal shield, as that of a rook or gallinule; a horny casque upon the head, as that of the cassowary (see cut under cassowary), a great helmet-like boss upon the bill, as in the hornbill. See cut under hornbill. (d) In anat.: (1) The annulus, especially, the part of the annulus which may cover the head of a new-born infant like a crest. Also called anul. (2) The galea capitis (which see, below). (3) In bot., a name given to the parts of the calyx or corolla when they assume the form of a helmet, as the upper lip of a thistle corolla.

2. In pathol., headache extending all over the head.—3. In surg., a bandage for the head.—

Galea capitis, galea aponeurotica, in human anat., names of the occipitofrontalis muscle, and especially of its tendinous aponeurosis, which covers the vertex of the skull like a cap.

galeast, n. See galleast.

galeate (gā'le-āt), a. [< L. galeatus, pp. of galeare, cover with a helmet, < galea, a helmet; see galea.] 1. Covered with a helmet, or furnished with something having the shape or position of a helmet. (a) In entom., provided with a galea, as the maxilla of certain insects. (b) In ornith., having on the head a crest of feathers resembling a helmet, or, and oftener, having a horny casque upon the head as the cassowary or a frontal shield as a rook or gallinule. (c) In bot., having a galea. (d) In zool., having a casque-like induration of the skin of the head, as many sturial fishes.

gale-day (gāl'day), n. Rent day. [Eng.]

galee (gā'le), n. [< gale + -ee.] In coal-mining, the person to whom a gale has been granted. [Forest of Dean, Eng.]

Galega (gā'le-ga), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. γάλα, milk, + γένος, lead, induce.] A genus of tall perennial leguminous herbs, with racemes of blue or white flowers and linear cylindrical pods. There are 3 or 4 species, of southern Europe and western Asia. The goat rue, G. officinalis, was formerly used in medicine as a diaphoretic and stimulant, and is occasionally found in gardens.

Geat's rue, or, as others call it, galega, may without disgust be taken somewhat plentifully in its entire substance as a salad.

Boyle, Inedibility and Salubrity of the Air.

Galei (gá-lé-i), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Galeus, q. v.] A subordinal name for all the sharks or selachians except the Rhina.

Galeichthys (gá-lé-ik'this), n. [NL., < Gr. gálēn, a weasel (later also a cat), + ichthys, a fish.] A genus of sea-eels, or marine catfishes, of the family Salutida and subfamily Tachysurinae or Ariinae, closely related to Tachysurus, and by some united with it, but it is generally distinguished by the smooth skin of the head.

Galeid (gá-lé-id), n. A shark of the family Galeidae. Also galeidan.

Galeida (gá-lé-i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Galeus + -ida.] A family of small sharks, selachians, or plagiostomous fishes, of the order Squali; the topes, in which the spiracles and nictitating membranes are both developed. The common tope, Galeus canis or Galeorhinus galeus, is an example. The family takes name from the genus Galeus, which is the same as Galeorhinus, and is now merged in a more extensive family Galeorhinidae. See out under Galeorhinus.

Galeidan (gá-lé-i-dan), n. Same as galeid. See J. Richardson.

Galeiform (gá-lé-i-fórm), a. [< L. galea, a helmet, + forma, shape.] Helmet-shaped; casque-like; resembling a galea.

Galeiform (gá-lé-i-fórm), a. [< NL. Galeus, q. v.] Having the form of a galeid; resembling the Galeidae.

Galeomyne (gá-lé-mi-nó), n. pl. [NL., < Galemys + -myne.] A subfamily of Talpidae; synonymous with Myogalinae.

Galemys (gá-lé-mis), n. [NL. (Knap, 1829), prop. Galeomyis, < Gr. gálēn, contr. gálēn, a weasel, + mys = E. mouse.] A genus of aquatic insectivorous mammals, of the family Talpidae and subfamily Galeomyne or Myogalinae, now called Myogale; the dormice or muskshrews. See desman. Also Galemys.

Galea (gá-lé-ná), n. [< L. galea, lead ore, dross of melted lead, < Gr. gálēn, lead ore (only as in L.), also an antidote to poison, lit. stillness (of the sea), calm, tranquillity.] 1. A remedy or antidote for poison; theriac. See theriac. — 2. Native lead sulphid. It occurs crystallized, commonly in cubes, and also massive, most varieties show perfect cubical cleavage. It has a brilliant metallic luster and a bluish-gray or lead gray color. It is a very common mineral, and is valuable as an ore of lead and often still more so as an ore of silver. The variety carrying silver is called argentiferous galea. Also called galena. False galea, or pseudo-galea. See Black-jack, 3, and bleude.

Galenian (gá-lé-ni-an), a. [< Galen (see Galenic) + -ian.] Same as Galenic. Galenian figure, the fourth figure of syllogism, the invention of which is attributed to Galen by Averroes and by a Greek philosopher. It consists of the indirect moods added to the figure by Theophrastus with their premises transposed — that is to say, the premise regarded by Theophrastus as the major is taken by Galen for the minor, and vice versa.

Galenic (gá-lé-nik), a. [< Galenus + -ic.] Pertaining to or containing galea. Also galenic.

Galenic (gá-lé-nik), a. [< Galen (L. Galenus, < Gr. Galēnos) + -ic.] Relating to Galen, a celebrated physician and medical writer (born at Pergamum in Mysia about A. D. 130), or to his principles and method of treating diseases. Galen was noted for his precise description of the bones, muscles, nerves, and other organs, and for his use of the methods of experiment and vivisection. The Galenic (as opposed to chemical) remedies consist of preparations of herbs and roots by infusion, decoction, etc. Also Galenic, Galenian.

I have given some idea of the chief remedies used by some of our earlier physicians, which were both galenic and chemical, that is, vegetable and mineral.

(O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 130)

galenical (gá-lé-ni-kal), a. Same as galenic. galenical (gá-lé-ni-kal), a. Same as galenic.

galeniferous (gá-lé-ní-fé-rus), a. [< L. galena, galena, + ferre = E. bear.] Containing or producing galena.

Galenism (gá-lé-nizm), n. [< Galen (see Galenic) + -ism.] The medical system or principles of Galen.

Galenist (gá-lé-nist), n. [< Galen (see Galenic) + -ist.] In med., a follower of Galen.

Your majesty's recovery must be by the medicines of the galenists and Arabians, and not of the chemists or Paracelsians. For it will not be wrought by any one fine extract or strong water but by a skillful compound of a number of ingredients. Bacon, To the King, Sept. 16, 1612.

We, like subtle chymists, extract and refine our Pleasure; while they, like fulsome galenists, take it in gross. Shadwell, Epicon, Wella, l. 1.

These galenists were what we should call herb-doctors to day.

(O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 819)

galenist (gá-lé-nist), n. [< Galen (see def.) + -ist.] A member of a galenist sect founded in 1664 by Galen Abraham de Haan, a physician and preacher of Amsterdam, constituting the Arminian division of the Waterlanders.

galenite (gá-lé-nít), n. [< galena + -ite.] Same as galena, 2.

Galenite (gá-lé-nít), n. [< Galen + -ite.] Same as Galenist.

Not much unlike a skillful galenist.

Whether the Patient shall do ill or well.

Sylvestor, tr. of On Burtas Weeks, II, The Trophies.

galenobismutite (gá-lé-nó-biz'mú-tit), n. [< galena + bismuth + -ite.] A sulphid of bismuth and lead, occurring in compact masses, having a tin-white color and brilliant metallic luster.

galentinet, n. Same as galantim, 1.

Galeobdolon (gá-lé-ob'dó-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. gálēn, a weasel, + bólōn, stretch, < bólōn, stink.] The old generic name of the weasel-snout, G. luteum, a common plant of Europe, now Lamium galeobdolon. See Lamium.

Galeocerdo (gá-lé-ó-sér-dó), n. [NL. (Müller and Henle), < Gr. gálēn, a kind of shark, + cerdos, a fox, also a weasel, lit. the wily one or thief.] A genus of sharks of the family Galeorhinidae. G. tigris is the tiger shark, so called from its variegation in color. Fossil species from the Eocene upward have also been referred to this genus.

galeod (gá-lé-od), n. [< Gr. gálēn, contr. of gálēn, of the shark kind; see galeid.] A shark of any kind. See J. Richardson.

Galeodes (gá-lé-ó-dé-s), n. pl. [NL., < Galeodes, q. v.] Same as Solpugida. Kirby and Spencer, 1826.

Galeodes (gá-lé-ó-dé-s), n. [NL. (Olivier, 1807), < Gr. gálēn, contr. of gálēn, of the shark kind, < gálēn, a kind of shark, + des, form.] A genus of arachnidians, typical of the family Galeodidae, or Solpugida. G. or Solpuga araneoides, a European species, resembles a large and very hairy spider. It runs with great rapidity, is very voracious and ferocious, and will even attack and kill small mammals, biting with its powerful jaws into a vital part. When attacked it throws up its head and assumes a menacing attitude; its bite is reputed to be venomous, though its poisonous effects are probably much exaggerated. It is found on the steppes of the Volga and in southern Russia.

galeodid (gá-lé-ó-did), n. A member of the Galeodidae.

Galeodidae (gá-lé-ó-dí-de), n. pl. [NL., < Galeodes + -idae.] A family of spider-like arachnids, constituting the order Galeodes or Solpugida or Solpugae; the weasel-spiders. They have a segmented cephalothorax, the head being distinct from the thorax; a long segmented abdomen; subchelate chelicerae; pediform pedipalps, like an extra pair of legs, making five pairs in all, two eyes, the body hairy; and tracheal respiration. These spiders are active, predatory, and nocturnal; they inhabit hot countries, chiefly of the old world. See Galeodes. Also called Solpugida.

galeoid (gá-lé-oid), a. [< Gr. gálēn, a weasel, + oides, form; cf. Gr. gálēn, of the shark kind, < gálēn, shark, + oides, form.] Weasel-like; applied specifically — (a) in entom., to the arachnidians of the family Galeodidae; (b) to the sharks or selachians of the family Galeidae or its equivalent.

The galeoid selachians T. Gill, Science, IV, 524.

Galeomma (gá-lé-om'm), n. [NL. (Turton, 1825), < Gr. gálēn, weasel, + omma, eye.] The typical genus of Galeommidae.

galeommid (gá-lé-om'id), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Galeommidae.

Galeommidae (gá-lé-om'i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Galeomma + -idae.] A family of bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Galeomma, established by J. E. Gray in 1840; associated by most recent conchologists with the Erginidae.

galeopithecid (gá-lé-ó-pi-thé-sid), n. An insectivorous mammal of the family Galeopithecidae.

Galeopithecidae (gá-lé-ó-pi-thé-si-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Galeopithecus + -idae.] A family of arboreal frugivorous flying quadrupeds, of the order Insectivora, constituting the suborder Dermaptera or Pterophora; the so-called flying-lemurs, formerly associated by some with the lemurs, by others even with the bats. They have a cutaneous expansion forming a parachute, extended to the wrists and ankles of the long slender limbs, including the tail, and advancing upon the neck; the digits also being broadly webbed. They are characterized by palmate and deeply pectinate lower incisors, having teeth like a comb; mammary testes; a pendulous penis; a lacinate uterus; axillary mammae; a large caecum, well-developed orbits and zygomatics; the alula and radius united distally, while the ulna and humerus are distinct; large tympanic muscles bulge, and a long pubic symphysis. The dental formula is, $\frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1} \frac{1}{1}$. See Galeopithecus. Also called Galeopithecinae.

galeopithecine (gá-lé-ó-pi-thé-sin), a. Having the characters of a flying-lemur; of or pertaining ing to the genus Galeopithecus or family Galeopithecidae.

galeopithecoid (gá-lé-ó-pi-thé-koid), a. Same as galeopithecine.

Galeopithecus (gá-lé-ó-pi-thé-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. gálēn, a weasel, + pithekos, an ape.] The typical and only genus of the family Galeopithecidae. There are two species of flying-lemurs, G. volans and G. philippensis, inhabiting the forests of the Flying-lemur, Galeopithecus volans.

Philippines and other islands of the Indian archipelago, and the Malay peninsula, subsisting chiefly on leaves, but also doubtless on insects. They are nocturnal in habit, passing the daytime hanging head downward in the trees like bats, and during the night gliding through the air for many yards at a leap, by means of their great parachutes. See flying lemur.

Galeopsis (gá-lé-op'sis), n. [L. (Pliny), a kind of nettle, blind nettle, < Gr. gálēnos (Dioscorides), appar. for gálēnos*, < gálēn, a weasel, + opsis, appearance.] A small genus of annual labiate weeds of Europe. The common hemp-nettle, G. Tetrahit, is widely naturalized in the United States.

galeorhinid (gá-lé-ó-rin'id), n. A selachian of the family Galeorhinidae.

Galeorhinidae (gá-lé-ó-rin'i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Galeorhinus + -idae.] A large family of anarthrous selachians, containing about 20 genera and a third of the species of sharks. They have an anal and two dorsal fins without spines, the head oval above, the eyes with a nictitating membrane, and the hinder gill slit above the base of the pectoral fin.

Galeorhinine (gá-lé-ó-rin'i-né), n. pl. [NL., < Galeorhinus + -inae.] The typical subfamily of Galeorhinidae, having the teeth compressed and entire or serrate.

Galeorhinus (gá-lé-ó-rin'nis), n. [NL. (De Blainville, 1816), < Gr. gálēn, a kind of shark, + rhin, a shark.] A genus of small sharks, typical of the family Galeorhinidae; the tope and oil-sharks. G. galeus or Galeus canis is the tope, and G. oxyrinus is the oil-shark of California. Also called Galeus (which see).

Oil-shark, Galeorhinus (oxyrinus). (From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

Galeosaurus (gá-lé-ó-sá-rus), n. [NL. (B. Owen, 1839), < Gr. gálēn, a kind of shark, + saur, lizard.] A genus of fossil crocodiles, characterized by their theriodont dentition. See the extract. Also written Galeosaurus.

The most remarkable, in reference to the dental system, is the Galeosaurus, in which the well marked differences in size and shape permit the division of the teeth, in both upper and lower jaws, into incisors, canines, and molars. Owen, Anal., I, 469.

Galeoscoptes (gá-lé-ó-skóp'téz), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1831), < Gr. gálēn, a weasel, also sometimes a cat, + skoptēs, a mocker, < skabōrōn, mock.] A genus of mocking-thrushes of the subfamily Miminae, or a subgenus of Mimus, the type and only member of which is the common cat-bird of the United States, G. pr. M. carolinensis. See cat-bird.

galeot, galeotet, n. See galiot.

Galeotherium (gá-lé-ó-thé-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. gálēn, a weasel, + therion, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil carnivorous quadrupeds, probably of the family Uccridae.

galera (gá-lé-rá), n. [NL., < L. galera, occasional form of galerum, a helmet.] 1. A plantigrade carnivorous quadruped, Galeosaurus, of the subfamily Mimulinae, inhabiting South America; the tatra. — 2. [cop.] A genus of which the galera is the type, or a subgenus of Tatra (Galeria barbara).

Gallitis, contrasted with Grisonia. J. E. Gray. —3. Plural of galerum.

Galerella (gal-é-rel-á), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1864), < L. galerum, galera, a helmet, + dim. -ella.] A genus of Ichneumonidae, of the subfamily Herpestinae and family Vierriidae.

Galeri, n. Plural of galerus.

Galeria (gá-lé-ri-á), n. [NL., orig. Galleria (Fabricius, 1794), prob. < L. galerum, helmet: in ref. to the palpi, which are directed back over the head.] A genus of pyralid moths, of the family Galeriidae. G. caryana or medionella is the bee-moth, a great pest in apiculture, the destructive larvae of which feed on the wax, and also bore tubes or galleries in it. See bee-moth.

galericula, n. Plural of galericulus.

galericulate (gal-é-rik-ú-lát), a. [< L. galericulus, a cap (dim. of galerum, a kind of hat), + -at³.] Covered as with a hat or cap; having a little galera.

galericulum (gal-é-rik-ú-lum), n.; pl. galericula (-la). [L., dim. of galerum, galerus: see galerum.] In Rom. antiq., a peruke. See galerum.

Galeriidae (gal-é-ri-á-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Galeria + -idae.] A family of pyralid moths, the bee-moths, taking name from the genus Galeria: used by few authors. Also spelled Galleridae, Gallerida.

Galerita (gal-é-ri-tá), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), < L. galerum, a helmet, + -ita.]

1. A genus of caraboid beetles. G. janus, a common species of the United States, found under stones in summer, is about three-fourths of an inch long, bluish black with red legs, antennae, and prothorax; the head is elongate, and the prothorax less than half as wide as the truncate elytra. 2. In Mollusca, same as Capulus.

galerite (gal-é-rit), n. [< NL. Galerites, q. v.] An echinite or fossil sea-urchin of the genus Galerites or family Galeritidae.

Galerites (gal-é-ri-té), n. [NL., < L. galerum, a helmet, + -ites.] A genus of echinites, or fossil sea-urchins, chiefly from the Chalk: so called from the hat-like figure. G. albogalerus, one of the commonest species, is so called from its fancied resemblance to the white cap of a priest.

Galeritidae (gal-é-rit-á-dé), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1835), < Galerita + -idae.] A family of sea-urchins typified by the genus Galerites, with globular or subpentagonal shell, central mouth, eccentric anus, and non-petaloid ambulacra converging to a common apex.

Galeruca (gal-é-rú-ká), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1764), of uncertain formation; perhaps < L. galera, a helmet, + cruca, a caterpillar.] The typical genus of the family Galerucidae, resembling the larger flea-beetles, but having the front flat with a median impressed line.

G. anthracina is a European species which damages the elm, and is said to have been introduced in America as early as 1837. It is of oblong form, a quarter of an inch long, of yellowish-green color, striped with black. Also spelled Galleruca.

Galerucidae (gal-é-rú-á-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Galeruca + -idae.] A family of tetrastemon herbivorous beetles, of the series Cyclis or Phytophaga, of the order Coleoptera, and typified by the genus Galeruca, now often merged in Chrysomelidae. Also called Galerucæ (Latreille, 1802), Galeruoidæ (Leach, 1815), Galerucetæ (Latreille, 1825), Galerucitæ (Newman, 1834), Galerucides (Westwood, 1839), and Galerucaræ (Shuckard, 1840). [The group is disused.]

galerum, galerus (gá-lé-rum, -rus), n.; pl. galeri, galeri (-ri, -ri). [L., also galera (nont., masc., and fem. respectively), a helmet-like covering for the head, a cap, < galca, a helmet: see galca.] In Rom. antiq.: (a) A peruke or periwig worn by both men and women. The frequent changes in the style of hair-dressing were initiated by these perukes. They were also worn for disguise, etc. (b) A round or helmet-like hat of leather; a hat or head-dress worn by some priests, especially the flamen Dialis; any close-fitting cap, whether of cloth or of leather.

As a separate male head-dress, there was the galerus, a hat of leather, said to have been worn by the Lacumones in early times. [Eng. Brit., VI, 456.]

Galesaurus (gal-é-sá-rus), n. Same as Galeosaurus.

Galestes (gá-les-tés), n. [NL., supposed to stand for Galestes, < Gr. gálēx, a weasel, + stēs, a robber.] A generic name applied by Owen to the remains of a large mammal found in 1858 in the Purbeck beds of Upper Cretaceous age, supposed to have been a carnivorous marsupial, one of the premolars of which had an external vertical groove.

galete, n. See gallet.

galete (gá-let), n. [< Gr. gálē, a weasel.] A book-name of the fousse, Cryptoprocta ferox, a feline quadruped of Madagascar. Cuvier. See Cryptoprocta.

Galeus (gá-lé-us), n. [NL., < Gr. gálēx, a kind of shark marked like a weasel, < gálē, a weasel, marten, polecat.] A genus of sharks, giving name to the family Galeidae, and variously defined by different authors. G. cuneus, also called Galeorhinus galeus, is the common tope, penny dog, or miller's dog, one of the smaller sharks, about a foot long, with sharp, triangular, serrated teeth. See cut under Galeorhinus.

galguld (gal-gú-lid), n. A bug of the family Galguldæ.

Galgulidæ (gal-gú-li-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Galgulus + -idae.] A family of heteropterous hemipterous insects, of the group Aucoriscæ. It contains dark colored bugs living in moist places, having a short, thick, clumsy body, a nearly vertical shield-like triangular face, prominent eyes, short, stout, acute, retrorse rostrum, protuberant prothorax, blunt elytra, short apiculate fore thighs, and long free hind legs. Also called Galautæ and Galutidæ.

galgulus (gal-gú-lus), n. [NL., < L. galgulus, some small bird, the witwall.] 1. In ornithology, an old book-name of various birds, among them the roller, Coracias garrula. In the technical name of the name of various species, as Galgulus garrula, a bird of prey. [Linn. Systema Naturæ, 1760.] 2. [cap.] In entomology, the typical genus of bugs of the family Galguldæ, of heavy build, with large prominent eyes, hollowed beneath to receive the short stout antennae. The genus is exclusively American. G. aculeatus is an example.

gallat (gá-li-á), n. [NL., a var. of (or an error for) L. galla, gallnut: see gall.] An old medical composition in which galls were an ingredient. [Dunham.]

gallage (gá-li-á), n. [< gall + -age, Cf. ML. galagium, a tax, tribute.] In contermining, the royalty paid by the galce. [Forest of Dean, Eng.]

Galle (gá-lik), n. A rare spelling of Galle.

Galician (gá-lí-sh-ian), a. and n. [< Galicia (Sp. Galicia, lit. 'L. Gallicus, pl. Gallici, a people of western Hispania: see Gallegan) + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to Galicia, a former kingdom and later county and province in the northwestern part of Spain (now divided into four provinces), comprising a part of the ancient Roman province of Gallaecia.

The family of Cervantes was originally Galician. [Tucknor, Spain, lit. II, 99.]

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Galicia in Spain. Also called Gallegan.

Galician (gá-lí-sh-ian), a. and n. [< Galicia (G. Galicia) (see def.) + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to Galicia, a crownland of the Galileithan division of Austria-Hungary, on the Russian frontier, formerly a part of Poland.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Galicia in Austria-Hungary; specifically, one of the indigenous inhabitants of Galicia, who are chiefly Slavs, divided into Poles and Ruthenians, speaking their native Slavic tongues.

Galictis (gá-lik-tis), n. [NL. (Bell, 1820), < Gr. gálēx, a weasel, a marten, + ictis, the gálēx ictis, or yellow-breasted marten.] A genus of South American plantigrade Mustelinae, including the grison and the galera, related to the martens. G. vittata is the grison, sometimes called the South American wolverine or gluton, and Galina marten. G. barbara is the tatra or galera. The genus is now usually divided into two, Galictis proper or Grisonia for the first of these animals, and Galera for the second. See Galera.

Grison (Galictis or Grison vittata).

Galidia (gá-lid-á), n. [NL. (Isid. Geoffroy, 1837), < Gr. gálēx, a young weasel, dim. of gálēx, a weasel.] A genus of viverrine carnivorous quadrupeds, type of a subfamily Galidiinae, of the family Viverridae. There are several species peculiar to Madagascar, as G. elegans.

Galidictis (gal-i-dik-tis), n. [NL. (Isid. Geoffroy, 1839), < Gr. gálēx, a young weasel (dim. of gálēx, a weasel), + ictis, the yellow-breasted marten.] A genus of herpestine carnivorous quadrupeds, of the family Viverridae and subfamily Herpestinae, found in Madagascar. G. vittata and G. striata are two longitudinally striped species.

Galidiinae (gá-lid-á-i-ne), n. pl. [NL., < Galidia + -inae.] A subfamily of the family Viverridae, typified by the genus Galidia, having the sectorial tooth strong, the upper tubercular molars broad, the feet subplantigrade, and the tail moderately long, bushy, and not prehensile.

Galilean (gal-i-lé-án), a. and n. [< L. Galilæus, < Gr. Galilaia, pertaining to Galilee, < Galilaia, L. Galilæa, Galilee, < Heb. Galil, Galilee, lit. a circle.] 1. a. Pertaining to Galilee, the northernmost division of Palestine in the time of Christ, lying north of Samaria. Galilean lake, the lake of Genesareth, or sea of Galilee or of Tiberias, lying on the eastern border of Galilee.

Last came, and last did go.
The pilot of the Galilean lake.

[Milton, Lycidas, l. 109.]

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Galilee.

And about the space of one hour after another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this fellow also was with him. For he is a Galilean. [Luke xlii, 66.]

2. One of a class among the Jews who opposed the payment of tribute to the Romans about the time of the emperor Augustus.—3. A Christian, as a follower of Jesus Christ, called the Galilean: used by the ancient Jews in contempt.

He [Julian the Apostate] died in the midst of his plans in a campaign against Persia, characteristically exclaiming (according to later tradition), "Galilean, thou hast conquered!"

[McClintock and Strong, Cyc. Biblical Lit., IV, 1090.]

Galilean² (gal-i-lé'an), n. [< Galilee, prop. only the 'Christian' name of Galilee Galilee, the Italian family of Galilei being so called from one of its members, Galileo de' Bonaiuti. The name represents L. Galilæus, Galilean, of Galilee in Judea: see Galilean.] Of or pertaining to Galilee, a great Italian mathematician and natural philosopher (1564-1642), who laid the foundations of the science of dynamics. He was one of the earliest advocates of the Copernican system of astronomy, and made many important astronomical discoveries. Galilean law, the law of the uniform acceleration of falling bodies. Galilean number, the quantity g , or the acceleration of gravity. Galilean telescope, a telescope with a concave lens for its eyepiece, like an opera glass. See telescope.

galilee (gal-i-lé), n. [< OF. galilee, galilei, < L. Galilæa, Galilee: see Galilean.] A chapel connected with some early English medieval churches, in which penitents and catechumens were placed, to which monks returned after processions, in which ecclesiastics were allowed to meet women who had business with them, and whence the worthy dead were buried. The galilee was often lower than the rest of the church, and was considered less sacred. Then galilees remain in England, connected with the cathedrals of Durham, Ely, and Lincoln. The name is supposed to have been suggested by the passage cited from Mark. Compare narthex.

But go your way, tell his (Christ's) disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him. Mark xvi. 7.

Durham's Galilee, however, is not a porch, for it has no entrance save from the church itself.

The Century, XXXV. 2.

galilee-porch (gal-i-lé-pórch), n. A name sometimes given to a galilee when it has direct communication with the exterior, and can thus be considered as a vestibule to the main church.

galim, n. Same as gallem.

galimatias (gal-i-má'shías), n. [Formerly also galimatias; < F. galimatias, nonsense, gibberish. According to Huet, the term arose from the blundering speech of a certain advocate, who, pleading in Latin the cause of a man named Matthew, whose cock had been stolen, often used, instead of gallus Mattheus, Matthew's cock, the words gallus Mattheus, the cock's Matthew! But this story is doubtless a mere concoction, suggested by the form of the word. It is perhaps merely a popular variation of galimatias, a melody: see galimatias.] 1. Confused talk; gibberish; nonsense of any kind.

And now Tacitus, so long famed for his political sagacity, will be made to pronounce this galimatias from his oracular tripod, 'The Jews were not convicted so properly for the crime of setting fire to Rome, as for the crime of being hated by all mankind.'

Warburton, Divine Legation, iv., Pref.

2. Any confused or nonsensical mixture of incongruous things.

Her dress, like her talk, is a galimatias of several countries. Walpole, Letters, II. 332.

galimeta-wood (gal-i-mé'th-wúd), n. The wood of the white bull-tree of the West Indies, Diphysa salicifolia. See bully-tree.

galingale, n. See galangal.

galingalee (gal-ig-jé'), n. [< Turk. galyonji, a man-of-war's man, a sailor in the navy, < galyon, a man-of-war (prob. < It. galcone, a galcon: see galcon), + ji, a suffix denoting occupation.] A Turkish sailor.

All that a careless eye could see

In him was some young Galimalee

Byron, Bride of Abydos, II. 2.

galiot (gal-i-ót), n. [Also galoot, formerly galoot, galoot. < ME. galote = D. galoot = G. galiotte, galotte = Dan. galoot = Sw. galiot, < OF. galiote, F. galiote, galotte, f., OF. (also F.) galiot, m., = Sp. Fg. galvota = It. galvotta, < ML. galvota, dim. of galea, a galley: see galley.] 1. A small galley or a sort of brigantine formerly in use, built for pursuit, and propelled by both sails and oars, having one mast and sixteen or twenty seats for rowers.

The whole Naute there meeting together, were 254 tall shippes, and about three score galioles.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 24.

Certain galioles of Turks laying aboard of certain vessels of Venice.

Capt. Roger Bolenham (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 371).

The prerogative of a private centinel above a slave, lies only in the name, and the advantage of any stand for the gallerian.
Gentleman's Magazine, p. 181.

galleried (gal'e-rid), a. [< gall + ed.] Provided or fitted with a gallery; disposed like a gallery.

One of the galleried fronts of an old London inn.
Colonial and Indian Exhibition, 1880.

Galleriidae, Galleriidae, n. pl. See Galleriidae.
gallery (gal'e-ri), n.; pl. galleries (-r-iz). [Early mod. E. galery, galary; = D. galery; = G. galerie; = Dan. Sw. galleri, < OF. galerie, galerie, F. galerie; = Sp. galera; = Pg. galera; = It. galleria (ML. galeria, galleria), a long portico, a gallery; orig., perhaps, a place of amusement, a special use of OF. galerie, galerie, mirth, glee, sport, amusement, < OF. gale, show, mirth, festivity, etc.: see gallant and gala.] 1. An apartment of much greater length than breadth, serving as a passage of communication between the different rooms of a building, or used for the reception of pictures, statues, armor, etc.; a corridor; a passage.
But for Polites, one of Priam's sons,
Escaped from the slaughter of Pyrrhus,
Comes fleeing through the weapons of his foes,
Searching all around the long galleries
And the void courts.
Surrey, Sheld, II.

For this world and the next world are not to the pure in heart two houses, but two rooms, a gallery to pass through, and a lodging to rest in, in the same house, which are both under the one roof, Christ Jesus.

Donne, Sermons, x.
Amongst other things he saw Galleries full of Greeke Images.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 59.

Hence—2. A room or building for the exhibition of works of art, or, by extension, a collection of such works for exhibition.—3. A platform projecting from the interior walls of a building, supported by pillars, brackets, or consoles, and overlooking the main floor, as in a church, theater, or public library.

After dinner, he departed out of the hall and went up into a gallery, of twenty four staves of height.
Benson, Tr. of Froissart's Chron., IV. xxvii.

He sat down amidst the loud clapping of hands, in which the Lords below the bar and the strangers in the gallery joined.
Macaulay, Historical Essays, IV. 326.

These galleries were also useful as adding to the accommodation of the church, as people were able thence to see the ceremonies performed below, and to hear the mass and music as well as from the floor of the church.
J. Ferguson, Hist. [Arch.], I. 570.

4. A narrow passage, open at least on one side, and often treated as a decorative feature, on the exterior or interior walls of an edifice, entering into the architectural design and at the same time affording communication between different parts, or facilities for keeping the building in repair.
The name is sometimes given, by extension, to similar features intended only for ornament and not affording a means of communication. Such galleries are usual in the choir of churches.
Round the roofs run, a gilded gallery
That lent broad verge to distant lands.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

5. The persons occupying the gallery at a theater.
While all its throats the gall extends,
And all the thunder of the pit ascends.
Pope, Dunciad, II. 439.

The galleries would certainly lose much of their veneration for the theatrical king, queen, and nobles, if they were to see them behind the scenes, undignified.
Knox, Spirit of Disputation, § 21.

6. An ornamental walk or enclosure in a garden, sometimes formed by trees or shrubs.

These kinds of terraces or little gall of pleasure, Suetonius called Menhans.
Cicero, Cicerones, I. 30.

7. An underground passage, specifically, (a) A horizontal or inclined subterranean passage, whether cut in the soil or built in masonry, connecting different parts of a fortification, or a fortification with a mine or series of mines. In military engineering, a gallery is an underground passage whose dimensions exceed a 4 by 4 feet, when of less size, it is called a branch or branch gallery. See carp gallery (under carp) and air gallery (under air gallery). (b) In mining, a level or drift. (Rarely used except in translating the French word galerie.)

8. In zoöl, a long narrow excavation of any kind made by an animal, as the underground passages dug by a mole, the boring of an insect, etc.—9. Vault, a frame like a balcony projecting from the stern and quarters of a ship. The part at the stern is called the stern-gallery, that at the quarters the quarter-gallery.—10. In architecture, a small ornamental parapet or railing running along the edge of the top of a table, shelf of a cabinet, or the like, intended to prevent objects from being pushed off. In decorated furniture of the eighteenth century the galleries were an important feature. They were commonly of gilt wood. Gallery hit, shot, etc., a showy or superficially brilliant play in a game, such as to win applause from the spectators. [Galleg.]—Whispering-gallery, a gallery or dome in which the sound of words uttered in a low voice or whisper is communicated to a greater distance than under any ordinary circumstances. Thus an elliptical chamber, if a person standing in one of the foci speak in a whisper he will be heard distinctly by a person standing in the other focus, although the same sound would not be audible at the same distance under any other circumstances or at any other place in the chamber. The reason is that the sounds produced in one of the foci of such a chamber strike upon the wall all round, and, from the nature of the ellipse, are all reflected to the other focus.

gallery-furnace (gal'e-ri-fér'näs), n. A peculiar kind of furnace formerly used in the district of Zweibrücken in Germany for reducing mercurial ore. It consisted of a chamber long enough to hold from 20 to 50 cucurbits, arranged in two parallel rows, which were heated by a fire made on a grate below. Each cucurbit had a small separate condenser made of earthenware.

gallery-picture (gal'e-ri-pik'tür), n. A painting too large for the walls of an ordinary room; hence, a picture fitted to be displayed only in a gallery.

gallery-road (gal'e-ri-ród), n. An artificial roadway constructed on piles, or in the form of inclined terraces on the side of a hill, so as to admit of a gradual descent, or in any analogous way.

galless (gal'les), a. [< gall + -less.] Without gall; good-natured; meek; gentle. [Rare.]
A dove, a meek and galless creature.
Whole Duty of Man, § 12.

gallet (gal'et), n. [Also written galet; < F. galet, a pebble, collectively shingle, dim. of OF. gal, a stone. Cf. F. caillon, a flinty pebble, and see callard.] A fragment of stone broken off by a mason's chisel; a spall.

gallet (gal'et), v. t.; pret. and pp. galleted, galletted, pp. galleting, galletting. [More commonly in the corrupted form garret, < gallet, n.] To insert small pieces of stone into the joints of, as coarse masonry: as, to gallet a wall. Parker. Also garret.

galleta-grass (ga-la'ta-gräs), n. [Sp. galleta, hard-tack.] A very coarse, hard bunch-grass of the southwestern United States.

galleting, galletting (gal'et-ing), n. [Verbal n. of gallet, v.] The act of inserting chips of stone or flint into the joints of rubblework while the mortar is wet. Also called garretting, garretting.

galletylet, n. See galletylet.

galley (gal'i), n.; pl. galleys, formerly also gal-lies (-iz). [Formerly also galley, early mod. E. galay, galy; = ME. galay, galay, etc.; = D. G. Dan. gale; = Sw. galja, < OF. galce, galce, F. gale; = Pr. galen, galien, gale; = Sp. Pg. (obs.) galea; = It. galea, < ML. galea, galica, MGr. γαλῆα, γαλῆα, a galley; ulterior origin unknown. Hence ult. F. galere; = Sp. Pg. It. galera, a galley, and E. galass, galot.] 1. A sea-going vessel propelled by oars, or using both oars and sails.

The earliest ships of all nations were of this class, and were at first confined chiefly to coasting or to the navigation of narrow seas. The war galley of the Greeks originally had a single mast carrying one square sail amidships; and later two masts, but depended primarily upon its oars, ranged in a single line on each side, and each handled by one rower. It was rated according to the whole number of these. The principal sizes were the trireme, of thirty oars, and the pentecoste, of fifty. Ships of this form continued to be used as vessels of burden, but were early superseded for war by galleys rated according to the number of banks of oars or ranks of rowers, as the bireme (two banked vessels), trireme, quadrireme, etc. Greater numbers of banks are mentioned, up to forty banks of oars in a vessel of enormous size built for Ptolemy Philopater of Egypt. How these numerous banks of oars were arranged is not definitely known; it is probable that not more than three could have been placed one above another. The first recorded Roman fleet consisted wholly of triremes, and this was always the most common armament. The ancient naval vessels were long, sharp, and narrow in model, like a modern steamer, were capable of great speed, and carried large crews. Full decks, or several decks, were in time substituted for the primitive half deck, or the short decks at the stem and stern, and rams, towers, and other means of offense and defense were added. Galleys continued in use in the Mediterranean and other seas till late in the seventeenth century, ordinary ones in later times having from five to twenty five oars on a side in a single row, each oar worked by several men, with two or three masts and triangular sails; and indeed they may be considered as not yet entirely obsolete, being represented by the feluccas and boats of similar model on the Mediterranean and neighboring seas. Larger vessels were called galassae (see galassae). The labor of rowing was from an early date assigned to mercenaries, and afterward to slaves and prisoners of war, and in some countries, especially France, nearly all criminals were condemned to service on the galleys of the state, and were hence called galley-slaves. See trireme.

When the Sainies [Saxons] caught the Galleges, they were full gladder, and rouer in who that might first in the greatest haste.
Merlin (E. E. T. A.), II. 357.

It is made a galley matter to carry a knife whose point is not broken off.
Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 17, 1664.

The Dromones, or light galley, of the Byzantine empire were content with two tiers of oars.
Gibbon, Decline and Fall, III.

King Ferdinand's galley were spread with rich carpets and awnings of yellow and scarlet, and every sailor in the fleet exhibited the same gaudy colored liveries of the royal house of Aragon.
Percy, Percy's Tales, II. 22.

2. A state barge; a large boat, especially one used in display; in a special use, an open boat formerly employed on the Thames in England by custom-house officers and press-gangs, and for pleasure.

And each proud galley, as she passed
To the wild cadence of the blast, Drove wilder minstrelsy. Scott, L. of the L. l. 15.

The Jack . . . asked me if we had seen a four-oared galley going up with the tide? . . . "You think Custom 'a, Jack?" said the landlady. "I do," said the Jack. Dickens, Great Expectations, liv.

3. A boat, somewhat larger than a gig, appropriated for the captain's use on a war-ship. [Eng.]—4. The cook-room, kitchen, or caboose of a merchant ship, man-of-war, or steamer; also, the stove or range in the galley.

To me he [the ship's cook] was unweariedly kind, and always glad to see me in the galley, which he kept as clean as a new pin, the dishes hanging up burnished, and his parrot in a cage in one corner.

R. L. Stevenson, Treasure Island, x.

The place had much of the furniture of one of our present caboose or galleys. There was a kind of dresser, and there were racks for holding dishes, an old brass time-piece, . . . a couple of wooden bellows, and such matters. W. C. Russell, Death Ship, xlv.

5. In printing, an oblong shallow tray of brass or wood, rarely of zinc, on which the compositor deposits his type. The galley of wood (now little used) is usually hanged only on the lower side and at the top. Brass galleys, and also some wooden galleys, are flanged on both sides, and of these the type can be locked up for taking proofs. See proof galley and die galley. Standing galley, an immovable inclined plane, fitted with cleats, on which type is kept standing.

galley-arch (gal'i-ärch), n. pl. A structure for the reception and security of galleys in port. Hamersly, Compare galley-house.

galley-balk (gal'i-bäik), n. [Also galleybank, galleybank, bank; < galley + balk.] A balk in the chimney, with a crook, on which to hang pots, etc. Brockitt, [Prov. Eng.]

Like the pathways by means of which pots were hung over village fires from the galley-balk, which in those days was to be found stretched across every house-place chimney. N. and Q., 7th ser., IV, 343.

galley-bird (gal'i-bärd), n. A woodpecker.

galley-cabinet (gal'i-kab'i-nät), n. In printing, a series of shallow pigeonholes with inclined supports, in which galleys of type are placed.

galley-division (gal'i-di-vizh'on), n. In arith., a variety of scratch division (which see, under division); so called because an extended example made a mass of figures somewhat in the shape of a galley.

galley-fire (gal'i-fär), n. The fire in the cook's galley on board ship.

galley-foist (gal'i-föist), n. A barge of state; sometimes specifically applied to the barge in which the Lord Mayor of London formerly went in state to Westminster.

* When the galley-foist is afloat to Westminster.

B. Jonson, Epicoene, iv. 1.

This is your brother's will; and, as I take it, he makes no mention of such company as you would draw unto you, — captains of galley-foists, such as in a clear day have seen Calais. Beaumont and Fletcher, Sea-bell, l. 2.

galley-halfpenny (gal'i-hä'pé-ni), n.; pl. galley-halfpence (-péns). [Early mod. E. galleyhalfpenny; so called because introduced by Italian merchants, commonly called galley-men; see galley-man, 2.] A silver coin of Genoa (and perhaps of other Italian cities), once much imported into England, especially in the fifteenth century. The coin had an illegal circulation in England as a halfpenny, and seems also to have been called a jeune. This year [1811, Hen. VIII.] galley halfpenny was banished out of England. Arnold's Chronicle (1502-1510), ed. 1811, p. 111.

Removed for 15 pieces of galley halfpenny sold this year at Churchwardens' Account Book (1521-22).

They had a certain coine of silver amongst themselves, which were half-pence of Genoa, and were called galley halfpence. Stone, Survey of London (ed. 1599), p. 97.

Venetian merchants who traded to England in their galleys brought their own money, called galley halfpence, to trade with, to the injury of our countrymen. They were repeatedly forbidden by . . . Hen. IV., v. VI., and VIII. Davies, Glossary.

galley-house (gal'i-höus), n. *A boat-house.

* These galley-houses are 50 or 60 paces from the river side; and when they bring the galleys into them, there is a strong rope brought round the stern of the vessel, and both ends stretched along, one on each side. Dampier, Voyages, an. 1688.

galley-man (gal'i-män), n. 1. One who rows in or has charge of a galley.—2. A merchant trading with galleys; specifically, an Italian merchant who landed wines, etc., from the galleys at a place called "Galley-key" in Thames street, London.

galley-news (gal'i-nüz), n. Naut., unfounded rumor. [Colloq.]

galley-proof (gal'i-prüf), n. A proof from type on a galley.

galley-punt (gal'i-pünt), n. An open boat used on the coast of England for communicating with ships.

Right ahead of us was a small galley punt, flashing through the sea under her fragment of reefed canvas. W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xlii.

galley-rack (gal'i-räk), n. In printing, a series of inclined brackets made to hold galleys.

galley-rest (gal'i-räst), n. In printing, two projecting arms or brackets, inclined, to hold a galley; or a ledge fixed upon a compositor's upper case to hold the galley temporarily out of his way.

galley-slave (gal'i-släv), n. 1. A person condemned for a crime to work at the oar on board a galley. This practice no longer exists, but the French still use the equivalent term galérien interchangeably with forçat (which see).

Liberty.

Flushed, that effects like these she should produce,

Worse than the deeds of galley slaves broke loose.

Cooper, Table Talk, l. 327.

2. A compositor, jocosely regarded as bound to the "galley." Moron, Mech. Exercises, p. 302.

galleytillet (gal'i-till), n. Same as galtille.

galley-work (gal'i-wörk), n. Work in baked clay; pottery in general.

galley-worm, n. See galley-worm.

galley-yarn (gal'i-yärn), n. Naut., an unfounded rumor or tale, such as is often heard in ships' galleys. [Colloq.]

gall-fly (gal'fl), n. [= fl. gall-fliege; as gall + fly.] An insect which occasions galls on plants by puncturing them; especially, a hymenopter of the group Gallia or Diplopterus as a cynipid. See gall, and gall under Cynipids. Guest gall-flies. See gall-flies.

gall-gnat (gal'nät), n. The popular name of those dipterous insects of the family Cecidomyiidae which make galls on plants. Most of them belong to the genera Cecidomyia or Diplosa. The larva is a minute, legless, usually reddish-suffrag, which for the most part spins a delicate cocoon. It must undergo, before transforming to pupa; the adult is a very graceful, delicate, two-winged fly. The galls of the several species on different plants are extremely diverse in form and character; they are often found on annual plants, which is seldom the case with those of the gall-makers of the hymenopterous family Cynipidae.

Gall-gnat (female), a species of Cecidomyia, natural size. b, much enlarged.

Gall¹ (gal'i),

n. pl. [L., pl.

of gallus, cock.] Same as Gallina or Gallinacea.

Gall², n. Plural of Gallus.

gallambi, n. Plural of gallambus.

gallambic (gal-i-äm'bik), a. and n. [= L. gallambicus (Afr. gallamb, bent., see gallamb, meter). < gallambus; see gallambus.] I. a. Constituting a gallambus, consisting of gallambi; an epithet of a variety of Ionic verse said to have first come into use among the Galli or priests of the Phrygian Cybele. See gallambus.

II. n. A gallambus; a verse consisting of four Ioniae a minore with variations and substitutions.

gallambus (gal-i-äm'büs), n.; pl. gallambi (-bi). [= L. gallambus, lit. a song of the Galli, so called from its association with the worship of the Phrygian goddess Cybele, whose priests, the Galli, are said to have used such measures in lines of invective or railery; see Gallus 2 and gallambus.] In prose, a kind of Ionic verse consisting of two iambic dimeters catalectic, the last of which wants the final syllable. The gallambus is also called metronion.

Gallian (gal'i-an), a. [= L. Gallia, Gaul, + -an.] Of or pertaining to Gaul or France; Gallie; French. [Rare.]

An eminent monarch that, it seems, much loves

A Gallian girl at home

Shak., Cymbeline, l. 7.

galliard (gal'yärd), a. and n. [I. a. MF. gay-lard, < OF. galliard, gallart, F. gallard = Fr. gallart, gallart, gallart = Sp. gallardo = Pg. gallardo = It. gagliardo, gay, lively, brisk, merry. Origin uncertain. II. a. < F. galliard, a jolly, gay fellow; in def. 2, like F. gallarde, < Sp. gallarda, a lively dance, fem. of gallardo, lively. See I.] I. a. Brisk; gay; lively; jaunty. [Archaic.]

Galliard he was, as goldfynch in the schaw.

Chaucer, Cook's Tale, l. 3.

Mr. We either, looking on each other, thrive—

An. Shoot up, grow galliard—

Mr. Yes, and more alive!

B. Jonson, Love's Welcome at Holborn.

A landsman could hardly have worn this garb and shown this face, and worn and shown them both with such a galliard air, without undergoing stern question before a magistrate. Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, p. 272.

These wretched Comparat were once gay

And galliard, of the modest middle class.

Browning, Ring and Book, l. 87.

II. n. 1. A brisk, lively man; a gay, jaunty fellow: as, "Selden is a galliard." Cleveland.

William Johnstone of Waughray, called the Galliard, was a noted frolicsome. . . . The word is still used in Scotland, to express an active, gay, dissipated character. Scott, quoted in Child's Ballads, VI, 160.

2. A spirited dance for two dancers only, common in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: one of the precursors of the minuet. Also called romanesco.

Sung with voice or to the lute, Clithron or Harpe, or danced by measures as the Italian Pavan and galliard are at these dates. Pattenham, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 87.

And bids you be advise'd, there's naught in France

That can be with a noble galliard won.

Shak., Hen. V., l. 2.

If you had but your long stockings on, to be dancing a galliard as he comes by.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, III, 3.

3. Music written for such a dance, or in its rhythm, which is triple and emphatic, but not rapid. [Obsolete or archaic in all uses.]

galliardise, n. [Also galliardize; < OF. gallardise, < galliard, gay; see galliard.] Merriment; excessive gaiety; merrymaking.

I am no way facetious, nor disposed for the mirth and galliardise of company; yet in one dream I can compose a whole Comedy, behold the action, apprehend the jests, and laugh myself awake at the conceits thereof.

Sir T. Browne, Kelly's Model.

galliardness (gal'yärd-näs), n. Gaiety.

His rest failed him, his countenance changed, his spiritless pleasure and galliardness abated. Garton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 202.

galliaset, n. See galliaset.

Gallie¹ (gal'ik), a. [= L. Gallicus, pertaining to Gaul or the Gauls, < Gallia, Gaul, Gallus, a Gaul; see Gaul.] Of or pertaining to Gaul or France.

The sturdy squire to Galie masters stoop,

And drown his lands and manors in a coupe.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 502.

Not only the presence in France of Alcuin, but the consequences flowing from his thoughtful foresight, soon made themselves felt among our Gallic neighbours. Lock, Church of our Fathers, l. 262.

gallie² (gal'ik or gal'ik), a. [= F. gallique, < NL. gallicus, < L. galla, gallnut; see gall.] Belonging to gall or oak-apples; derived from galls.

Gallie acid, C₁₂H₁₀O₆, an organic acid which crystallizes in brilliant prisms, generally of a pale yellow color, without odor and having an acid taste. It exists ready formed in the seeds of the mango, and is a product of the decomposition of tannic acid. With ferric salts in solution it produces a deep bluish black precipitate. It is used in medicine as an astringent and is well known as an ingredient in ink. See ink.

Gallican (gal'i-kan), a. and n. [= L. Gallicanus, < Gallia, Gaul; see Gaul.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Gaul or France.

The Gallican script, which was the parent of the Irish uncial.

Lower Faculty, The Alphabet, II, 116, note.

2. Specifically, pertaining to the Roman Catholic Church in France. See Gallikanum.

But in regard to the central question, where the total liberty of the Church lies, the Christians are well as that the Gallican belief, that nothing has the seal of infallibility which has not been received by the whole Church, in effect in France. Poiry, London, p. 279.

The Gallican theory of church government views the Church as a constitutional monarchy, of which the Pope is either Pope, Bishop, or merely June, lack of distinction, the responsible head, invested with legislative and executive functions while the supreme representative power of the Church, the Council of Council, is in abeyance; but owing to the absence of such a system when assembled, liable to be suspended or deposed by it and compelled to submit to its decisions on pain of the guilt and the consequences of schism. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, l. 15.

Gallican Church, the branch of the Roman Catholic Church in France, which has enjoyed greater privileges and had a more independent development than the branches of that church in other European countries. Its comparative independence has been due to the persistent resistance of the civil power, supported by a portion of the clergy and people distinctively called the Gallican party, to the encroachments of the papal power; but there has always been a strong ultramontane party in the French church favorable to papal claims. Gallican liberties, the peculiar privileges enjoyed by the Gallican Church. In general they consisted of greater freedom from papal domination over the actions of the bishops and of the king than was customary in other Roman Catholic countries, or than is customary in France at the present time. These liberties were especially defined by the pragmatic sanction of Louis IX. in 1269, and by the "Declaration of the Clergy" drawn up by Bossuet in 1682, which asserted the right of the king to intervene in church matters without papal interference. The Gallican liberties were confirmed under the rule of Napoleon I., but the French church is becoming increasingly ultramontane. Gallican liturgies, Gallican liturgy, the liturgy or group of liturgies anciently used in Gaul or France and in some adjacent countries, especially in Spain. In Gaul these liturgies were suppressed by Charlemagne and his successors in the ninth century, and the Roman office was substituted for them. The remains of these rites are few and fragmentary. The wording of some of the prayers in the different local uses differed greatly, but the important features and the arrangement of parts were the same throughout. The liturgies originally used in Spain were of the same class, so that the group has been called the Hispano-Gallican family of liturgies. In Spain these rites had by the eleventh century become almost entirely supplanted by the Roman, but at the beginning of the sixteenth century the typical Spanish form, known as the Mozarabic liturgy, was revived by Cardinal Ximenes. The ancient liturgies of the British, Irish, and Scotch apparently belonged to the Gallican group; but their classification is disputed, and the remains are scanty. The one established among the Anglo-Saxons by St. Augustine of Canterbury probably contained Gallican elements, of which there are traces in the use of Sursum, etc. The Gallican type of liturgy is believed to be derived from the primitive churches of Arles and Lyons from Ephesus, and has accordingly been called Ephesine, and referred to St. Paul and St. John. It differs greatly from the Roman in its constituent parts, their names, and arrangement, and agrees in many and important particulars with eastern liturgies. The nomenclature of its various parts is, however, almost entirely peculiar to itself, and it is distinguished by the fact that most of these parts, retaining their titles and places in the office, are variable, the number of different occasions for which such variations are provided being also much greater than in other western rites, and this variation extending even to the canon. See Mozarabic.

II. n. In Rom. Cath. theol., one who holds Gallican doctrines. See Gallicanism.

Gallicanism (gal'i-kan-izm), n. [< Gallian + -ism.] The spirit of nationalism within the French church, as opposed to the absolutism of the papal see. It grew in strength during the middle ages, and culminated in the reign of Louis XIV. The Gallican liberties, in which this spirit was expressed, disappeared at the time of the revolution, and, though since restored and nominally in existence, ultramontanism has during the nineteenth century triumphed over Gallicanism.

Gallicé (gal'i-sō), adv. [< L. Gallus, in French (Gallie), < Gallus, Gallie, French: see Gallie.] In French.

Gallicism (gal'i-sizm), n. [= F. gallicisme; as Gallie + -ism.] A form or style of speech peculiar to the French language; the use by an English or other foreign writer or speaker of a form or expression, as a particular sense of a word or manner of phraseology, peculiar to the French language. Thus, the use of the word "assist" in the sense of the present "on of the phrase" it goes without saying, and similar expressions, are regarded as Gallicisms.

Gallicize (gal'i-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Gallicized, ppr. Gallicizing. [< Gallie + -ize.] To make French in opinions, habits, or modes of speech; especially, to render conformable to the French idiom or language. Also spelled Gallicise.

Being, since my travels, very much gallicized in my character, I ordered a pint of claret.
—Samuel Smith, in Lady Holland, iv.

Gallicolæ (ga-lik'ō-lō), n. pl. [NL., pl. of gallicola: see gallicolous.] 1. In Latreille's system of classification, a tribe of hymenopterous insects of the section Pupipara, corresponding to the Diptoleparia, and to the modern family Cynipidae: the gall-flies.—2. In Meigen's system (1818), a group of dipterous insects of his family Tipularia, containing the genus Ceratomyia and other genera, and corresponding pretty accurately to the modern family Ceratomyidae: the gall-gnats or gall-midges.

gallicolous (ga-lik'ō-lus), a. [< NL. gallicola, < L. galla, gallnut, + colere, inhabit.] Inhabiting galls; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Gallicolæ.

galliform (gal'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. galliformis, < L. gallus, a cock, + forma, form.] Having the form or structure of a gallinaceous bird; of gallinaceous affinities; galline.

Galliformes (gal-i-fōr'mēs), n. pl. In ornith., formerly, gallinaceous birds collectively; now, in Garrod's classification, an order of a subclass Homalognata, consisting of the three cohorts Struthiones, Gallinaceæ, and Pittaci. [Not in use.]

galligaskins (gal-i-gas'kinz), n. pl. [Formerly also gallygaskins, gallygascynes, gallugascins (abbr. gaskins, gascynes); a corruption (due to a mistaken notion that "these trousers were first worn by the Gallie Gascons, i. e., the inhabitants of Gascony"—Webster's Dict.) of OF. gurguesques, Norm. gargars, a perverted form of grieguesques, "slops, gregs, gallogascins, Venetians," which appears contracted in "griegues, wide slops, gregs, gallogascins, Venetians, great Gascon or Spanish hose" (Cotgrave), really of Italian (Venetian) origin, < It. Grechesco, Greekish, < Greco, < L. Græcus, Greek: see Greek, grecco, grego, gregs. Cf. pantaloons, also of Venetian origin.] 1. A fashion of hose or slops worn in the sixteenth century. Also called gregs, venetians, and gaskins.

My galligaskins, that have long withstood
The winter's fury and encroaching frosts, . . .
A horrid chasm disclosed.

J. Philips, Splendid Shilling.

Off went his heavy boots; doubled to the right, galligaskins to the left. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 146.

Hence—2. Loose breeches in general.

Every good housewife made the clothes of her husband and family, and even the good wren of Van Twiller himself thought it no disparagement to cut out her husband's livery-woolsey galligaskins. Irring, Knickerbocker, p. 176.

3. Leather guards worn on the legs by sportsmen. Simmonds.

gallimatias, n. See galimatias.

gallop (gal'up), n. [= D. galop = G. galopp = Dan. galop = Sw. galopp, < OF. galopin, < Sp. galopi = It. galoppo; from the verb.]

1. A leaping or springing gait or movement of horses (or other quadrupeds), in which the two fore feet are lifted from the ground in succession, and then the two hind feet in the same succession. The term is commonly used to denote the movement intermediate in speed and action between the canter and the run, in which during the stride two, three, or all the feet are off the ground at the same instant. (See loose.) The details of the succession of motions and the system of the steps vary with the different species of quadrupeds.

That trot became a gallop soon,
In spite of curb and rein.

Cooper, John Gilpin.

2. A ride at a gallop; the act of riding an animal on the gallop. — 3. A kind of dance. See gallop.

Canterbury gallop, so named from Canterbury, because the custom is said to be to the ambling pace at which pilgrims rode to Canterbury, but this is probably fanciful. A rapid gallop of a horse; commonly applied to a rapid rowing race. Also called cubin. False gallop, in the same sense, apparently, an awkward pace.

But what pace is that that thy tongue keeps?
Mare? Not a false gallop? — Shak., Much Ado, iii. 4.

This is the very false gallop of veritas.

Shak., As you like it, iii. 2.

gallopade (gal'op-ad'), n. [Also (in def. 2) galopade, galoppade; = D. galopade = Dan. galoppade = Sw. galoppad, < F. galopade (= Pg. galopada = It. galoppata), < galoper, gallop: see gallop, v.] 1. In the manege, a side-long or curveting kind of gallop. — 2. A sprightly kind of dance, or the music adapted to it. gall-stone (gal'stōn), n. A concretion formed in the gall-bladder; a biliary calculus. Gall stones consist largely of cholesterol. A pigment said to be made from them is used in water-color painting, but the color sold as such is composed of other materials, probably gamboge and yellow lake. The gall-stone is a deep rich yellow, but is not permanent, and its color is destroyed by light. The commonest kind of gall-stone is used in water-color painting, on a coat of its brightness and durability, as a yellow coloring matter.

Gallus (gal'us), n. [NL., < L. gallus, cock.]

1. A genus of gallinaceous birds, of the family Phasianidae, having as type the domestic hen, G. domesticus, some if not all varieties of which are the modified descendants of Gallus ferrugineus or bankiva; the jungle fowl. Somewhat a jungle fowl, Gallus sonnerati, is another example. The same cock is now probably the nearest to the wild origin of all the varieties of the domestic fowl.

Jungle fowl (Gallus ferrugineus)

2. In Ichth., a genus of carangoid fishes. Lacépède, 1802.—3. In conch., same as Strombus. Megerle.

Gallus (gal'us), n.; pl. Galli (-i). [L., < Gr. Γαλ-, a, a priest of Cybele, so called, according to the tradition, from their raving, the name being associated with that of the river Gallus, Gr. Γαζ-ζος, in Phrygia, whose waters were fabled to make those who drank it mad.] In classical antiquity, a priest of Cybele. The worship of this goddess was introduced into Rome from Phrygia in 204 B. C. It consisted essentially of wild and boisterous rites, and it was the usage that these priests should be cannibals. The chief of the college was styled Archigallus.

These Man-women Priests were called Galli.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 70.

gallus (gal'us), a. Same as gallows.

galluses (gal'us-es), n. pl. Same as gallowses, plural of gallows, in sense 7.

gall-wasp (gal'wosp), n. A hymenopterous gall-insect; one of the Gallicola, Cynipida, or gall-flies.

gally (gal'i), a. [Cf. gall + -y.] Like gall; bitter as gall.

He abhorreth all gally and bitter drinkers of sin.
Cranmer, 1st Ep. Gardiner, p. 240.

gally (gal'i), a. [Formerly also gally; < gall + -y.] Characterized by galls or abraded spots.

I see in some meadows gally places where little or no grass at all growth by reason (as I take it) of the too long standing of the water. Such a, Surveilor's Dialogue.

gally (gal'i), r. t. [Var. of gallow.] Same as gallow.

The next day being Sunday, called by the natives of this country (Devonshire) Mass Sunday (and indeed not without some reason, for the people looked as if they were gally), I was waked by the tremendous sound of a horn-trumpet.
Tom Brown's Works, III, 205.

gally (gal'i), n. An obsolete or occasional spelling of gally.

gallygaskinst, gallygascynest, n. pl. Obsolete spellings of gallygaskins.

gallypot, n. See gallypot.

gallywasp, n. See gallywasp.

gally-worm (gal'i-worm), n. [The first element is uncertain.] A common name of sundry myriapeds or millipeds, as a thousand-leg of the genus Polydesmus. Also spelled gally-worm.

galloche, n. See galloche.

Galomys (gal'a-mys), n. Same as Galomys.

galon (F. pron. ga-lōn'), n. [F.] Same as gallon.

galoniert, n. [Perhaps from gallon, as indicating its capacity.] A vessel for table use and for decorating a court cupboard, probably of a size sufficient to hold about a gallon.

galoot (ga-lōt'), n. [Also galoot; of slang origin.] A fellow; a term of humorous contempt, often implying something awkward, silly, or weak in the person so designated. [Slang, U. S.]

I'll hold her nozzle agin the bank,
Till the last galoot washes.

John Hay, Jim Bludso.

galopt, v. An obsolete spelling of gallop.

galop (gal'up; as a F. word, gal'ō), n. 1. An obsolete spelling of gallop.—2. [F.] (a) A lively round dance of German origin. (b) Music for such a dance, or in its rhythm, which is duple and quick.

galopade (gal'op-ad'), n. Same as galop, 2.

galore (ga-lor'), adv. [Also formerly written galore, galore, galore, etc.; < Fr. ga-lor = Gael. ga-lor or leor, sufficiently, enough; ga, a particle prefixed to an adj. to form an adv.; leor, adj., sufficient, enough.] Sufficiently; abundantly; in plenty. It is often used with the force of a predicate adjective. [Humorous.]

Toasting they went, with true merriment,
And tipped strong liquor galore.

Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V, 222).

A shriek of welcome greeted them, they were set in a corner, with beef and ale galore, and soon the great table was covered in the ground cleared, the couples made, and the fiddlers tuning. C. Roade, Clouds and Sunshines, p. 8.

galosh (ga-lōsh'), n. [Also written gallosh, galosh, in pl. galoshes, galoshes, formerly galloshes, galage, galage, etc., and even galloshes (simulating shoes) (now also galuche, after F.); < ME. galocher, also galage, galage, < OF. galocha, F. galuche = Sp. Pg. galocha = It. galocchia (ML. galocia), prob. < ML. calopalla, a clog or wooden shoe, < Gr. καλοπαλι, dim. of καλός, kalos (good), a shoemaker's hat, < καλός, wood (prop. wood for burning, < καλός, burn), + παλι (good) = F. foot.] 1. A kind of clog or patten worn in the middle ages as a protection against wet, and common, because of the practice of making shoes of cloth, silk, or the like, or of ornamental leather.

With oute spores other spores and apraklike he looked,
As is the kynde of a knight that cometh to be doctored,
To geten his gylte spores and galoches y-cowped.
Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 12.

2. In present use, any overshoe; a rubber; usually in the plural. [Rare in the U. S.]

Rose, having been delayed by the loss of one of her galoches in a bog, had been once near Catherine . . . during that dripping descent.

Miss H. Ward, Robert Elsmere, viii.

Dutch galoshes, skates [Rare.]

And had I but Dutch galoshes on,
At one run I would slide to Len.

Cotton, The Great Frost.

galosh (ga-lōsh'), v. t. [Cf. galosh, n.] To protect with a partial covering, edging, or the like of strong or water-proof material, as a shoe.

His boots . . . had been "soled" and "heeled" more than once, had they been galoshed, their owner might have defied Fate!

Barham, Ingolshay Legends.

galpt, v. t. [ME. galpen, gapen; perhaps akin to gyp, q. v.] To gape; yawn.

See how he galpt, lo, this drunken wight,
As though he wold us swallow anon right.

Chaucer, Prologue to Manly's Tale.

Next, mynd thy grave continually,
Which galps, thee to devour.

Kendall, Flowers of Epigrams (1577).

galravage, galravage (gal-rav'ā), (-rāj), n. and v. Same as galravage.

The witches lang syne had their sinful ponies and gal-ravachies.
Galt, Annals of the Parish, II.

Oh! hurkee! Oh! this lass o' mine—She thinks as because she's gone galratergung, I must ha' missed her and be killing.
Mrs. Gaskill, Sylvia's Lovers, vi.

galrush (gal'rush), n. The red-throated diver or loon, Colymbus septentrionalis. [Dublin Bay, Ireland.]

galt (galt'), n. [Also gault, gult, < Norw. gald, hard ground, a place where the ground, or snow, is trodden hard. See galt, gald, gult, gult, hard snow.] 1. Clay; brick-earth. [Prov. Eng.] Specifically—2. In geol., the lowest division of the Upper Cretaceous series. The galt is a stiff clay sometimes sandy or calcareous dark blue in color, with layers of pyrites and phosphatic nodules, and occasional scars of green sand. It varies from 100 to 300 feet in thickness, and forms a marked boundary between the Upper and the Lower Cretaceous rocks.

galt (gal't), n. [Cf. ME. galt, < Icel. galt, also galt = Sw. Dan. galt, a gelded hog; see geld, gilt.] A boar pig. [Prov. Eng.]

Grease grows as a galt, full grytch he takes!

North Arthurs (E. E. T. S.), I, 1101.

galtrop (gal'trop), n. Same as caltrop.

Errors in Divinity and Policy . . . are the cursed Continuance, drop Portentous, mourning Anguishes, sulphurous Grandeur, laden murderers, peevish Galtrops, and rascal desperadoes, which the Prince of Lycia employs with all his skill and malice, to maintain the walls and gates of his kingdom. N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 75.

galuchat (F. pron. ga-lü-shä'), n. [F.] A kind of shark's skin or shagreen usually dyed green, used to cover cases, boxes, etc. As prepared it retains the tubercles with which it is stud-ed in the natural state.

galvanic (gal-van'ik), a. [= F. galvanique = Sp. galvánico = Pg. It. galvanico (cf. D. G. galvanisch = Dan. Sw. galvanisk), < Galvani: see galvanism.] 1. Pertaining to galvanism, or current electricity as produced by a chemical battery (see electricity): same as voltaic, a word in more common use.

All the galvanic combinations, analogous to the new apparatus of Mr. Volta, . . . consist . . . of series, containing at least two metallic substances, or one metal and a stratum of fluids.

See H. Dorn, Philos. Trans. (1801), II., art. 20.

2. Spasmodic, like the movements of a limb produced by a current of electricity: as, a galvanic start. Galvanic battery, cautery, current, écrouleur, etc. See the nouns. Galvanic induction, induction of electric currents.

galvanical (gal-van'i-kal), a. [< galvanic +
-al.] Same as galvanic.

The phenomena of magnets, of electrical bodies, of galvanical apparatus, seem to form an obvious material for such speculations. Whewell, Philos. of the Mechanical Sciences

galvanisation, galvanise, etc. See galvanization, etc.

galvanism (gal-van'iz-m), n. [= D. G. galvanismus = Dan. galvanisme = Sw. galvanism = F. galvanisme = Sp. Pg. galvanismo, < It. gal-vanismo, so called after Luigi Galvani, professor of anatomy at Bologna (1737-98), the first investigator in this field. His theory was first published in 1792.] 1. That branch of the sciences of electricity which treats of electric currents more especially as arising from chemical action, as from the combination of metals with acids.
The name was given before the identity of this form of electricity and that produced by friction was fully understood: it is now nearly obsolete. See electricity.

2. In med., the application of an electric current from a number of cells: in distinction from faradism or the use of a series of brief alternating currents from an induction-coil, and from franklinism or the charging from a frictional or Holtz machine.

galvanist (gal-van'ist), n. [As galvan-ism +
-ist.] One versed in galvanism.

galvanization (gal-van-i-zä'shun), n. [< galvanize + -ation.] The act of galvanizing, or the state of being so affected. Also spelled galvanisation.

galvanize (gal-van'iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. galvanized, ppr. galvanizing. [= D. galvaniseren =
G. galvanisieren = Dan. galvanisere = Sw.
galvanisera = F. galvaniser = Sp. galvanizar = Pg. galvanizar = It. galvanizzare; as galvanic + -ize.] 1. To subject to the action of an electric or galvanic current, as in medicine.
The word is especially used of the act of restoring to consciousness by electrical action, as from a state of suspended animation; or of electrical restoration to a semblance of life, as a corpse or a severed part of the body.

The agitations resembled the grinnings and writhings of a galvanised corpse, not the struggles of an athletic man. Macaulay, On History

Hence—2. To confer a fictitious vitality upon; give a mechanical semblance of life or vitality to.—3. To plate, as with gold, silver, or other metal, by means of galvanic electricity; elec-troplate.

Also spelled galvanise.

Galvanised iron, a name given (a) improperly to sheets of iron coated with zinc by a non galvanic process, the iron being first cleaned by friction and the action of dilute sulphuric acid, and then plunged into a bath composed of molten zinc and other substances, as sal ammoniac, or mercury and potassium, (b) properly, to sheets of iron coated first with tin by a galvanic process, and then with zinc by immersion in a bath containing fluid zinc covered with sal ammoniac mixed with earthy matter.

galvanizer (gal-van'iz-er), n. One who or that which galvanizes. Also spelled galvaniser.

galvano- Combining form of galvanic or galvanism.

galvanocaustic (gal-van-ö-käs'tik), a. [< galvanic + caustic, q. v.] Relating to the heat derived from a current of electricity when employed in cauterization.

galvanocauterization (gal-van-ö-kä'te-ri-zä'- shun), n. [< galvanic + cauterization.] Cauterization by the heat induced by a current of electricity.

galvanocautery (gal-van-ö-kä'te-ri), n.; pl.
galvanocauteries (-riz). [< galvanic + cautery.]
In surg., a cautery in which a galvanic current is used to heat the cauterizing part of the apparatus.

galvanoglyph (gal-van-ö-glif), n. [< galvanic
+ Gr. γλῦψω, engrave.] A picture produced by galvanography.

galvanography (gal-van-ö-g'li-f), n. [As galvanoglyph + -y.] A method of producing an electroplate which may be used in a printing-press. The essential features of the process are the use of a zinc plate covered with a ground, and etched as a matrix for an electroplate, the reverse plate thus obtained being used in printing. The picture obtained by this method is called a galvanoglyph.

galvanograph (gal-van-ö-gräf), n. [< galvan- + Gr. γραφω, write.] 1. A plate formed by the galvanographic process.—2. An impression taken from such a plate.

galvanographic (gal-van-ö-gräf'ik), a. [< galvanography + -ic.] Pertaining to galvanography.

galvanography (gal-van-ö-g'ra-f), n. [As galvanograph + -y.] A process for producing plates which will give impressions after the manner of a plate used in copperplate engraving. The drawing is made on a silvered plate in which points, in such a way as to leave the dark parts slightly raised. An electrotype is taken from this, which may be used as an engraved plate, the dark lines now being depressed precisely as in a copper plate. An impression from such a plate is called a galvanograph.

galvanologist (gal-van-ö-l'ö-jist), n. [< galva-nology + -ist.] One who describes the phenomena of galvanism.

galvanology (gal-van-ö-l'ö-ji), n. [< galvan- + Gr. λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] A description of the phenomena of galvanism.

galvanomagnetic (gal-van-ö-mag-net'ik), a.
Same as electromagnetic.

galvanometer (gal-van-ö-m'et-er), n. [< galvan-
+ Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for detecting the existence and determining the strength and direction of an electric current.
In all galvanometers the principle of action is the same.
It depends upon the force, which first discovered to be exerted between a magnetic needle and a wire carrying a current—a force which tends to set the needle at right angles to the direction of the current, and whose intensity, other things remaining the same, depends directly upon the strength of the current.

The term galvanometer is applied to an instrument for measuring the strength of electric currents by means of the deflection of a magnetic needle round which the current is caused to flow through a coil of wire.

See P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag.

Aperiodic galvanometer, a dead beat or thoroughly damped galvanometer. Astatic galvanometer, an instrument which consists of a pair of similar needles magnetized, with their poles turned opposite ways, and stiffly connected at their centers, so that both will swing together

Astatic Galvanometer.

The one tends always to turn in a direction opposite to the other under the earth's magnetic attraction, so that if the needles were perfectly alike they would form a perfectly astatic pair, or a pair that would not tend to assume any particular direction from the magnetic influence of the earth. One of the needles, a, is nearly in the center of the coil, CDEF, through which the current passes;
the other, b, is just above the coil. When a current travels the coil in the direction of the arrows, the action of all parts of the current upon the a and b needles tends to urge the astatic pole a toward the back of the figure and the boreal pole b to the front, while the upper needle, a, is affected principally by the current CD of the coil, which urges the astatic pole a to the front of the figure and the boreal pole b to the back. Both needles are thus urged to rotate in the same direction by the current, and, as the opposing action of the earth is greatly enfeebled by the combination, a much larger deflection is obtained than would be given by one of the needles if employed alone. Galvanometers are also made astatic by the use of a fixed magnet so placed as to counteract the influence of the earth's magnetism.—Ballistic galvanometer, an instrument used to measure the strength of a current which acts for only a very short time, as that produced by the discharge of a condenser. It involves the use of a heavy needle, which takes a relatively long time to swing. The sine of half the angle of the first swing is proportional to the quantity of electricity which has flowed through the coil.—Dead-beat galvanometer, a galvanometer in which the needle is so damped, by induction or otherwise, that on the passage of a current it will move to its final deflection without oscillation.—Differential galvanometer, a form of galvanometer in which the coil consists of two separate wires wound side by side, and used to compare two currents.

If the currents are sent in opposite directions through these wires the motion of the needle will be determined by the difference in their intensity; if they were equal the needle would remain stationary.—Sine galvanometer, a magnetic needle poised at the center of a coil of insulated copper wire wound round a vertical circle that may be turned horizontally on its stand. In use the needle and vertical circle are at first both in the magnetic meridian.
When a current passes, the needle is deflected, and the vertical circle is turned by the observer until its plane coincides with the magnetic axis of the needle. The strength of the current is as the sine of the angular deviation.

Any sensitive galvanometer in which the needle is directed by the earth's magnetism can be used as a sine galvanometer, provided the frame on which the coils are wound is capable of being turned round a central axis.

See P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag., p. 167.

Tangent galvanometer, a very short magnetic needle delicately suspended so as to turn in a horizontal plane.
The point about which it turns is at the center of a vertical coil of copper wire through which the current is passed. The diameter of the coil is at least ten or twelve times the length of the needle. The needle is therefore usually not more than half an inch long; and, for convenience of reading its deflections, long light pointers of aluminum or of glass fiber are cemented to its ends. In use the instrument is placed so that the vertical coil of copper wire is in the plane of the magnetic meridian. The current is then sent through the coil, and the angle by which the needle is deflected is read off. The strength of the current then is proportional to the tangent of the angle of deflection, whence the name of the instrument.— Thomson's mirror galvanometer, the most sensitive galvanometer yet invented. Its needle, which is very short, is rigidly attached to a small, light, concave mirror, and suspended in the center of a vertical coil of very small diameter by a silk fiber. A movable magnet is provided for bringing the needle into the plane of the coil when the latter does not coincide with the magnetic meridian, and also for rendering the needle more or less astatic.
Needle, mirror, and magnet weigh only about 1½ grains.
At a distance of two or three feet from the mirror is a solid wooden stand, with a graduated scale, facing the mirror.
In the stand, just under the center of the scale, a hole is cut, and a fine wire is stretched upright across it. A strong lamp stands behind the opening so that its light will fall on the mirror and be reflected back on the scale. An image of the wire will thus be constantly thrown on the scale, and the slightest motion of the needle and its mirror will produce a much greater motion of this image.
As the current flows the one way or the other the index will move to one side or the other. This galvanometer was devised for use in connection with the Atlantic submarine cables. It was long the only instrument with which signals could be read through long submarine lines; and it is still employed to a great extent, though now superseded by the siphon recorder of the same inventor.

galvanometric (gal-van-ö-met'rik), a. [As galvanometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the galvanometer or to galvanometry: as, the galvano-metric needle.

galvanometrical (gal-van-ö-met'ri-kal), a.
Same as galvanometric.

The parts of the stand include . . . the necessary clamping screws for electrical and galvanometrical connections.
The Engineer, LXV., 510.

galvanometry (gal-van-ö-m'et-ri), n. [As galvanometer + -y.] The art or process of determining the strength of electric or galvanic currents; rheometry.

galvanoplastic (gal-van-ö-plas'tik), a. [As gal-vanoplasty + -ic.] Pertaining to the reproduction of forms by electrolysis.—Galvanoplastic process, a method of obtaining copies of type, an engraving, a design, etc., by electrical deposition: ordinarily the same as electrotyping. As applied to art-work, the phrase refers to the process of electroplating a plaster model with bronze, the mold being afterward destroyed and the plaster withdrawn, leaving a hollow figure in bronze. As applied to ornamental work in glass, the phrase is used for a method of decorating glass surfaces by means of electroplating, the design being first traced on the glass in some metallic pigment and burned in.

galvanoplasty (gal-van-ö-plas'ti), n. [= F. galvanoplastie; as galvanic + Gr. πλάσσω, < πλάσ- σειν, form.] Same as electrotypy.

galvanopuncture (gal-van-ö-pungk'tür), n. [= F. gal-vano-puncture; as galvanic + puncture.] In med., the passage of a constant current through a part of the body by means of needle-shaped electrodes introduced into it.

galvanoscope (gal-van-ö-sköp), n. [= F. gal-vanoscope; as galvanic + Gr. σκόπεω, view.]
An instrument for detecting the existence and direction of an electric current. A magnetic needle may be used as a galvanoscope.

galvanoscope (gal'və-nō-skop'it), n. [gal- + scope + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a galvanoscope.

galvano-thermometer (gal'və-nō-thēr-mom'ē-ter), n. [As galvanic + thermometer.] An apparatus used in measuring the amount of heat produced by an electric current in passing through conductors of varying resistance.

galvanotropism (gal'və-nōt-rō-pizm), n. [galvanic + Gr. τροπή (tropē) in comp., turn round, + -ism.] In bot., the movements in growing organs produced by the passage through them of electric currents.

Living found that when a root is placed vertically between two electrodes it curves towards the positive electrode—that is, against the direction of the current. In one case (cabbage) the curvature was towards the negative electrode. Muller (Hettinger), in repeating Kiffing's experiments, found that the curvature was in all cases such as to tend to place the long axis of the root in the plane of the current, the curvature being towards the negative pole. These phenomena are spoken of as "galvanotropism." Encyc. Brit., XIX, 60.

galver (gal'vēr), v. t. [Origin obscure.] To move quickly; throb. [Prov. Eng.] galverly, adv. [As galver + -ly.] Quickly; nimbly; actively.

A light gaudy that is young and trottoth galverly, of good making, colour, and fast going. Wrothelley, To Sir T. Wyatt, Oct., 1537.

galwet, galwest, n. Middle English form of galloway.

galynget, n. See galangal. [Chaucer.]

galypoti, n. An obsolete form of gallipot.

gam (gam), v. t.; pret. and pp. gammed, ppr. gammung. [Perhaps a var. of gaml.] [cf. gammung.] 1. To herd together or form a school, as whales; crowd together and swim in the same direction. Hence—2. To make a call, exchange visits, have a chat, etc., as fishermen or fishing-vessels.

This visiting between the crews of ships at sea is called, among whalers, gammung. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 240.

gam (gam), n. [cf. gam, v.] 1. A herd or school of whales. Toward the close of a season, when whales are seen in large gam. It is regarded by the whalers as a sign that they will soon leave the grounds. Hence—2. A social visit between fishermen; a chat, call, or other exchange of courtesies, as when vessels meet and speak each other, exchange visits, give and take letters aboard, etc.

The gam was long and sober and serious; the two whalers, compared reckoning, hoped for whales, and discussed the weather in no complimentary manner. H. Melville, Moby Dick.

gama-grass (gā'mā-grās), n. A tall, stout, and exceedingly productive grass, Tripsacum dactyloides, cultivated in Mexico and elsewhere in southern North America, in the West Indies, and to some extent in Europe. It bears drought remarkably well, and the shoots may be cut three or four times in a season, making a coarse but nutritious hay, resembling corn fodder, of which cattle and horses are very fond.

Gamasas, Gamases (ga-mā'sē-lē, -ī), n. pl. Name as Gamasidae.

gamashes (ga-māsh'ēz), n. pl. [cf. OF. gamaches = It. gamascie (ML. gamacha), spatter-dashes, cf. OF. gambre, F. gambre, leg (cf. F. jamb), = It. gambra, leg; see jamb.] A protection for the shoes, hose, etc., from mud and rain, worn especially by horsemen in the seventeenth century. They appear to have been sometimes of the nature of boots and sometimes of the nature of leggings. Also gamaches.

Lay my richest ante on the top, my velvet slippers, cloth-of-gold gamashes. Wardour, What you Will, II, 1.

Incus is all bedaw'd with golden lace, Rose, doublet, jerkin, and gamashes too. Darius, Acquaintance of Folly (1611).

gamasid (gam'a-sid), n. A mite of the family Gamasidae.

Gamasidae (ga-mas'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., cf. Gamasus + -idae.] A family of tracheate arachnids, of the order Acarida; the beetle-mites or spider-mites. They have extensible chelate mandibles, two filiform palps or maxillae, equal hairy legs with six or more joints, two claws, and a disk or sucker, the first pair of legs usually tactile, the stigmata ventral and protected by a long tubular peritreme, and no ocellus. They are parasitic on insects, birds, and other animals, sometimes on plants. Those which infest poultry can live for a time on the human skin and give rise to intolerable itching. One species is very harmful to caged birds. The Gamasidae are most commonly parasitic during the nymphal and adult female stages. Also Gamasus, Gamasen (Duges, 1834), and Gamasida (Leach, 1814).

gamasus (ga-mas'), n. Another form of camass, camash.

Gamasus (gam'a-sus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802).] A genus of mites, typical of the family Gamasidae. G. colaspiformis is a common parasite of carrion-beetles, such as the Silphidae, which are found covered with these minute orange mites.

gamb, gamb (gamb), n. [cf. OF. gambre, jambre, F. gambre = Pr. gambra = Sp. gambra, QSp. also gamba, cama = It. gambra, cf. ML. gambra, leg. I.L. a hoof; prob. of Celtic origin, akin to cam, crooked; see cam.] cf. gambler, gamb. A leg or shank; in her., the whole fore leg of a lion or any other beast. If couped or crased near the middle joint, it is then only a paw. Also jambre.

gamba (gam'bā), n.; pl. gambas (-lē). [NL., cf. I.L. gambra, hoof, ML. gambra, leg; see gambra and jamb.] In anat., the metacarpus or metatarsus of some animals, as the ruminants and solidungulates.

gamba (gam'bā), n. Short for cul du gamba. See cul.

Some likewise there affect the gamba with the voice. To show that England could variety afford. Drayton, Polyolbion, IV, 248.

gambade, gambado (gam-bad', -ha'do), n. [cf. It. gambata, the leg; the form seems to imitate that of F. gambade, a gambol; see gambol, n.] 1. A spatterdash or gallop for covering the leg when riding or walking in muddy roads.

His thin legs tenanted a pair of gambades fastened at the side with rusty clasps. Scott.

2. pl. Boots fixed to the middle of a horseman, instead of stirrups. Fairholt.

I know not whether he [James I.] for hisson first brought up the use of gambades, much worn in the west, whereby, while one rides on horseback, his legs are in a coach clean and warm, in those dirty countries. Fidler, Worthies, Cornwall.

gambas, n. Plural of gambal.

gambaisont, n. Same as gambeson.

gambaloek, n. A kind of riding-gown. Darius.

A man of tall stature, clothed in a gambaloek of scarlet, buttoned down the chin with a hose of gold. Sandys, Travels (1657), p. 119.

gambe, n. See gamb.

gambeson, gambison (gam'bē-sōn, -hī-sōn), n. [MF. gambeson, gambison, gambeson, gambeson, gambeson, etc., cf. OF. gambeson, gambison, gambeson, gambeson, gambeson, also gambais, gambais, gambais, = Pr. gambason, gambais = QSp. gambais = OlG. gambais = D. gambais = MLG. gambais, -bus, -ben = MLG. gambais, gambais, G. gambais = Dan. gambais, cf. ML. gambeson (n.), with different suffix gambais, gambais, gambeson, cf. OHG. gambais = Goth. gambais = AS. gamb, belly, stomach, F. gamb; see vomb.] A garment worn originally under the habergeon, made sometimes of leather, sometimes of thick stuff, and even wadded, to guard against bruises which might result from blows received upon the mail. Toward the close of the fourteenth century, when the habergeon had been nearly abandoned by men-at-arms, the gambeson appears as the principal garment of defence for the body, and this continues until the complete and general adoption of plate armor. See gambeson.

gambet (gam'bet), n. [cf. gambetta (= It. gambetta, a gambet), so called from the length of the legs; dim. of OF. gambre = It. gambra, leg; see gamb, gamb.] A name of the redshank, Totanus calidris, and hence of other species of the same genus. See Totanus.

gambet-anipe (gam'bet-anip), n. Same as gambet.

Gambetta (gam-bet'ā), n. [NL. (Koch, 1816), = It. gambetta; see gambet.] An old name of the gambets, now used in ornithology as a generic name of those birds. G. calidris is the yellow legs of North America; G. melanoleuca is the greater tail tier; G. calidris is the redshank of Europe.

gambier, gambir (gam'bēr), n. [Malayan] An extract rich in tannin prepared from the leaves and young shoots of Uncaria Gambier, a rubiaceous shrub of the Malayan peninsula and islands, which climbs by means of hooked spines. It is used medicinally as an astringent, but is more extensively employed in tanning and dyeing. It occurs in commerce in cubical pieces of about an inch in size, opaque and of a yellowish color, with an even, dull fracture, and soluble in boiling water. It is chiefly imported from Singapore, and is also known as Terra Japonica and pala catechu.

We went along a good road . . . until we came to a pepper and gambir plantation. . . . I find that [gambir] is largely exported to Europe, where it is occasionally employed for giving weight to silks, and for tanning purposes. Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, II, xlv.

gambit (gam'bit), n. [cf. gambit, a gambit, cf. It. gambetto, a tripping up of one's legs (cf. OF. gambet, a tripping of the legs, a feint, a sudden attack, faire le gambet, or gambet, trip the legs, make a feint, deceive), cf. gambra, leg; see gamb, gamb.] In chess-playing, an opening in which a pawn or a piece is sacrificed, or at least offered, for the sake of, or with the object of obtaining, an advantageous attack. The gambit is said to be accepted or declined, according as the pawn or piece thus offered is or is not taken. A gambit played by the second player is called a counter gambit. Of all the chess openings, the Evans gambit (so named from a captain of the British navy, who originated it about 1833) has been the most thoroughly analyzed in its multitudinous variations, while next in order probably come the King's Bishop's gambit and the Scotch gambit. Some of the gambits differentiated below in the ordinary chess notation are developments of others, and, in particular, several (the Allgauer, King's Bishop's, Muzio, etc.) are ramifications of the King's gambit proper. Allgauer gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Center gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Center counter-gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Cunningham gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Damiano gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Danish gambit. a development of the Center gambit (see above) by 3P-K4. Evans gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Greco counter-gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Kieseritzki gambit. same as Allgauer gambit (see above), except that the knight is played to K6 instead of K5 as the fifth move. King's Bishop's gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Lopes gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Muzio gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Queen's gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Queen's Pawn counter-gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Salvio gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Scotch gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4. Steinitz gambit. 1P-K4, 2P-K4, 3P-K4, 4P-K4, 5P-K4, 6P-K4, 7P-K4, 8P-K4, 9P-K4, 10P-K4, 11P-K4, 12P-K4, 13P-K4, 14P-K4, 15P-K4, 16P-K4, 17P-K4, 18P-K4, 19P-K4, 20P-K4, 21P-K4, 22P-K4, 23P-K4, 24P-K4, 25P-K4, 26P-K4, 27P-K4, 28P-K4, 29P-K4, 30P-K4, 31P-K4, 32P-K4.

The gamboge of commerce is mainly derived from G. Hanburyi, a hand some laurel-like tree of Siam, Cambodia, and Cochinchina. (See cut under Garcinia.) It has a rich brownish orange color, becoming brilliant yellow when powdered, forming a yellow emulsion with water, and having a disagreeable acid taste. It is a drastic purgative, but is seldom used in medicine except in combination. It is mostly used as a pigment in water color painting, producing transparent yellows, verging on brown in deeper tints. It is quite durable as a water color, and fairly so in oil. Ceylon gamboge is obtained from G. Morella. False gamboge is a similar but inferior product of G. Xanthochymus. The so-called American gamboge is the juice of Viola Quamocina and other species of South America. In doses of a dram or even less gamboge has produced death.

gambrel-roof (gam'brél-rof), n. A roof the slope of which is broken by an obtuse angle like that of an animal's gambrel; a curb-roof. See extract under gambrel, n., 1.

gambroon (gam-brōn'), n. [Perhaps < Gombroon (Gombroon, Gombroon), a Persian seaport (now called Bender Abbas), from which a large export trade was formerly carried on.] A twilled cloth: (1) of worsted and cotton, used for summer trousers; (2) of linen, made for linings. Dict. of Needlework.

Gambusia (gam-bū'si-ā), n. [NL. (Poey, about 1850); < Cuban gambusina or gambusino, nothing; a proverbial term expressing humorously a supposed something that is really nothing.] A genus of cyprinodont fishes, containing such ovoviviparous killifishes as G. patulus, known as the top-minnow, a common species in the lowland streams of the southern Atlantic States.

Gambusinae (gam-bū'si-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Gambusia + -ina.] A subfamily of cyprinodont fishes, typified by the genus Gambusia. They have the dentary bones firmly united, the eyes normal, and the sexes diverse, the anal fin of the male being advanced forward and its anterior rays modified as an intromittent organ. The species are of small size and confined to America.

gamdeboo (gam'de-bō), n. [African.] The stinkwood of Natal, Celtis Kraussiana, a small tree with tough light-colored wood.

game (gām), n. and v. [*< ME. game, an abbreviation (due to mistaking the term -en for a suffix of inflection) of gamon, gomen, also spelled gammen (> mod. E. gammon, q. v.). < AS. gamen, gomen, game, joy, sport, = OS. gaman = OFries. game, game = OHG. gamin, MHG. gamen, joy, = Icel. gaman, game, sport, amusement, = OSw. gammen, Sw. gamman = Oldan. gamell, Dan. gammen, mirth, merriment. Hence ult. gamble, gammon, 1.] I. n. 1. Mirth; amusement; play; sport of any kind; joke; jest, as opposed to earnest: as, to make game of a person, or of his pretensions or actions (now the chief use of the word in this sense). See to make game of, below.*

"Wherefore," quod she, "in earnest and in game, To putte in me the defaulte ye see to blame." Georgica (L. E. T. S.), l. 874.

But goldes for to be it is no game. Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 290.

And gladness through the palace spread, We miche game and glee. Shak., Fair Annie (Child's Ballads, III, 380).

Then on her head they sett a girloud greene, And crowned her twit earnest and twit game. Spenser, F. Q., I, xli, 8.

We have had pastimes here, and pleasant game. Shak., I, I, l. v, 2.

These many years in this most wretched Island We two have liv'd, this even and game of Fortune. Pletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, i, 3.

Thou shalt stand to all posterity, The eternal game and laughter. B. Jonson, Sejanus v, 4.

2. A play or sport for amusement or diversion.

In their games children are actors, architects, and poets, and sometimes musical composers as well. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 250.

3. A contest for success or superiority in a trial of chance, skill, or endurance, or of any two or all three of these combined: as, a game at cards, dice, or roulette; the games of billiards, draughts, and dominoes; athletic games; the Floral games. The games of classical antiquity were chiefly public trials of athletic skill and endurance, as in throwing the discus, wrestling, boxing, leaping, running, horse- and chariot-racing, etc. They were exhibited either periodically, usually in honor of some god, as the Olympic, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games of Greece, the Ludi Apollinares at Rome, etc., or from time to time for the amusement of the people, as the Circus games at Rome. The prizes in the Greek periodical games were generally without intrinsic value, as garlands or wreaths of olive- or laurel-leaves, of parsley, etc.; but at the Panathenaic games of Athens the prizes were quantities of olive-oil from the consecrated orchards, given in a special type of painted amphora, of which a hundred or more might constitute a single prize. The four great Greek national games formed the strongest bond in the nature of a national union between the various independent Greek states. At them any person of Hellenic blood had the right to contest for the victory, the most highly esteemed honor in Greece; and citizens of all states, however hostile, met at these games in peace.

Lycæon hath the report of setting our first publicke games, and proving of matistries and feats of strength and activitie, in Arcadia. Holwood, tr. of Phry, vii, 64.

A fool That seest a game play'd home, the rich stake draw. Shak., W. T. I, 2.

In certain nations also there were instituted particular games of the torch, to the honour of Prometheus; in which they who ran for the prize carried lighted torches. Bacon, Physical Essays, II.

"My cocks," says he, "are true cocks of the game—I make a match of cock fighting, and then an hundred or two pounds are soon won, for I never fight a battle under." Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 30.

4. The art or mode of playing at a game: as, he plays a remarkable game.

"What wilt thou bet," said Robin Hood, "Thou shalt see our game the worse." Robin Hood and Queen Katherine (Child's Ballads, V, 317).

5. The successful result of a game, or that which is staked on the result: as, the game is ours.

All the best archers of the north Shold come upon a daye, And he that sholdeth altherbest The game shall bere away. Lyttell (Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V, 28)).

The ladies began to shout, "Madam, your game is gone." Robin Hood and Queen Katherine (Child's Ballads, V, 317).

6. The requisite number of points or advantages to be gained in order to win a game: as, in cribbage 61 is game or the game.—7. A scheme; plan; project; artifice.

From Lord Sunderlands returning to his post all men concluded that his declaring as he did for the exclusion was certainly done by direction from the King, who naturally loved craft and a double game. Ep. Bunnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1662.

8. Amorous sport; gallantry; intrigue.

Set them down For shittish spoils of opportunity, And daughters of the game. Shak., T. and C., IV, 5.

9. Sport in the field; field-sports, as the chase, falconry, etc.

Some sportmen, that were abroad upon game, spied a company of hunsards and cranes. Sir R. L'Estrange.

10. That which is pursued or taken in hunting: the spoil of the chase; quarry; prey.

Both of houndes and hawkis game, After he taught hym all; and same, In sea, in feld, and eke in ryvere. Quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 11.

The nearer the hound hunting is to his game, the greater is his desire, the fresher is the scent. J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1858), II, 203.

Hynde Etin's to the hunting game; And he has tane wi him his eldest son, For to carry his game. Hynde Etin (Child's Ballads, I, 226).

The King return'd from out the wild, He bore but little game in hand. Tennyson, The Victim.

11. Collectively, animals of the chase; those wild animals that are pursued or taken for sport or profit, in hunting, trapping, fowling, or fishing; specifically, the animals useful to man, and whose preservation is therefore desirable, which are enumerated under this designation in the game-laws regulating their pursuit.

By a very singular anomaly, which has had important practical results, game is not strictly private property under English law; but the doctrine on the subject is traceable to the later influence of the Roman law. Maine, Village Communities, p. 162.

12. A game-fowl or game-cock. See phrases below.—13. A flock: said of swans.

No man having less than five marks per annum could lawfully keep a game of swans. Encyc. Brit., XI, 701.

Action games. See Action.—Big game. The larger quadrupeds.—Black-breasted red game. The most typical variety of game fowl, in which the hackle and saddle feathers of the cock are a brilliant light red or orange, the back and wing-bows rich glossy red, the wing-coverts clear bay, the breast and lower part of the body solid black, more or less glossy, and the wing-bars and tail metallic black. A little white may show at the base of the tail. The eyes should be brilliant red. The hen is of a delicately pencilled grayish brown, with salmon breast and golden hackles faced with black. (Other varieties of the game-fowl distinctly characterized in color are the black cocks, duck-wings, piles, wheatears, and whites. — Brown-red game. See brown. — Bumper game. See bumper. — Capitoline games. See Capitoline. — Cock of the game. See cock. — Confidence game. See confidence. — Exhibition game. A game-cock or hen of a breed cultivated for perfection of form and coloring, without reference to the fighting qualities of the primitive game stock. — Floral games. See floral. — Game law. See game law. — Game of geese. See geese. — Game protection. the protection of game animals, specifically by legal restriction of the times for and methods of pursuing them. — Neapolitan, Nezean, Olympic, etc. games. See the adjectives. — Pit-game. a cock or hen of a fighting breed. — Red game. the Scotch plumed game. — Round game. a game, as at cards, in which an indefinite number of players can engage, each playing on his own account.

After the little music they sat down to a round game, of which there were a great many, such as Commerce, Speculation, Vingt-et-Un, Limited Loss, or Pope Joan.

W. Beaud, Fifty Years Ago, p. 90.

The game is not worth the candle. See scuffle. — The game is up. (a) In hunting, the game is started.

He that strikes

The venison first shall be lord of the feast.

Hark! the game is round!

... The game is up. Shak., Cymbeline, III. 3.

(b) The scheme has failed; all is at an end. [Colloq.]

The universal opinion is that the game is irreversibly up, and that the Tory party will be in power for fifty years to come.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 304.

To make (formerly a) game of, to turn into ridicule; make sport of, mock; delude or humbug.

Whanne I speke after my beste advise

God loved he best with al his hoolle herte

At alle tymes, though him game of sports.

(Kawser, Gen. Trid. to C. T., I. 534.

II. trans. To stake or lose at play; gamble (away). [Rare.]

It is for fear of losing the inestimable treasure we have that I do not venture to game it out of my hands for the vain hope of improving it. Burke, Ref. of Representation.

game² (gām), a. {A dial. form of game¹, crooked. Cf. gamb, dial. gamble, a leg. from the same ult. source.} Crooked; lame; as, a game leg. [Slang.]

Warrington burst out laughing, said that Bacon had got the game chair, and hawled out to Pin to fetch a sound one from his bedroom.

Thackeray, Pendennis, xii.

game-bag (gām'bag), n. A bag for holding the game killed by a sportsman.

game-bird (gām'bērd), n. A bird ordinarily pursued for sport or profit, or which is or may be the subject of a game-law. Such birds are chiefly of the gallinaceous order, or of the duck tribe, or of the plover and snipe groups of wading-birds. In the United States about sixty kinds of birds come under this definition.

game-cock (gām'kok), n. A cock bred from a fighting stock or strain; a cock bred and trained for fighting purposes.

Every year, says Fitzstephen, "on the morning of Shrove Tuesday, the school boys of the city of London bring game cocks to their masters, and in the fore part of the day, till dinner time, they are permitted to amuse themselves with seeing them fight."

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 375.

game-egg (gām'eg), n. An egg laid by a game-fowl, or from which a game-cock may be hatched.

game-fish (gām'fish), n. Any fish capable of affording sport to the angler, as the salmon, trout, bass, and many others; especially, a gamey food-fish.

A game fish is a choice fish, a fish not readily obtained by wholesale methods at all seasons of the year, nor constantly to be had in the market. A fish, furthermore, which has some degree of intelligence and cunning, and which matches its own wits against those of the angler.

Goode, American Fishes (1877), p. xiv.

game-fowl (gām'foul), n. A specimen of one of the varieties of the hen classed as games.

gameful (gām'ful), a. [< game¹, n., + -ful.] 1.

gamekeeper (gām'kēpēr), n. One who has the keeping and guarding of game; one who is employed to look after animals kept for sport in parks or covers, and to protect them from poachers.

As I and my companions

Were sitting of a snare,

The game-keeper was watching us,

For him we did not care.

The May Delight of a Shiny Night (song).

game-law (gām'lā), n. A law enacted for the preservation of the animals called game, by restricting the seasons and the manner in which they may be taken; generally in the plural.

This early game law (concerning the keeping of a dog) was primarily intended to stop the meetings of laborers and artificers, and has little permanent importance besides.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 472.

gameless (gām'les), a. [< game¹, n., + -less.] Destitute of game.

Gameon (gā-mō'li-on), n. [Gr. γαμήιον, so called because it was the fashionable time for weddings, < γαμήιον, pertaining to a wedding, < γαμν, marry. An older name was Agamion.] The seventh month of the Attic year. It consisted of thirty days, and corresponded to the latter half of January and the first part of February.

gamey³, n. and v. See game¹ and gammon¹.

gamey⁴ (gā-mēn'), n. Madder dried and ground into powder, without removing its outer covering. McElrath, Conn. Diet.

gamey⁵ (gām'nēs), n. The quality of being game or brave; courage; pluckiness.

There was no doubt about his gamey.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, xxi.

The over-preservation of the red deer has caused them to degenerate, and much of their hardihood and gamey is being lost besides which they are much smaller than formerly, though considerably more numerous.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 609.

Counterfalte pageants and jugglings of gameplayers.

Culver, Four Godly Sermons, IV.

game-perserver (gām'prē-zerv'er), n. In England, a landowner or lessee of game who strictly preserves it for his own sport or profit, often to the injury of the neighboring farmers, whose crops are subject to its depredations.

gamesome (gām'sum), a. [< ME. gamsum (= Ircl. gamasam; cf. OHG. gamansamo, adv., gamenessly), < game¹ + -some.] Sportive; playful; frolicsome.

I write from the fire side of my parlour, and in the noise of three gamesome children.

Donne, Letters, xxiiv.

The beasts grow gamesome, and the birds they sing.

Thou art my sun, great God! Quarles, Emblems, v. 12.

To whom thus Belial, in like gamesome mood.

Milton, P. L., VI. 680.

Then ran she, gamesome as the milt,

And livelier than a lark

She sent her voice thro' all the hoit

Before her, and the park.

Tennyson, Talking Oak.

gamesomely (gām'sum-li), adv. Sportively; playfully.

gamesomeness (gām'sum-nēs), n. The quality of being gamesome; playfulness.

gamester (gām'stēr), n. [< game¹ + -ster.] 1.

One who games; a person addicted to gambling; a gambler.

The losing gamester shakes the box in vain,

And bleeds, and loses on, in hopes to gain.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

A fighting gamester is only a pluckpocket with the courage of a highwayman.

Steele, Tatler, No. 26.

2. A merry, frolicsome person.

You are a merry gamester.

My lord Banda. Shak., Hon., VIII. 1. 4.

Such petulant, jealous gamesters, that can spare

No argument or subject from their jest.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, I. 1.

You have another gamester, I perceive by you;

You durst not slight me else.

Fletcher, Wife for a Month, I. 1.

3. One who competes at athletic games. [Prov. Eng.]

The weapon [in the game of back sword] is a good stout ash stick with a large basket handle, heavier and somewhat shorter than a common single-stick. The players are called "old gamesters." . . . why, I can't tell you . . . and their object is simply to break one another's heads; for the moment that blood runs an inch anywhere above the eyebrow, the old gamester to whom it belongs is beaten and has to stop.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 2.

4. A swan-keeper.

The keeper who looked after them [a game of swans] was the gamester.

Encyc. Brit., XI. 791.

5. A prostitute.

She's impudent, my lord;

And was a common gamester to the camp.

Shak., All's Well, v. 3.

gamestress (gām'stress), n. [< game¹ + -stress.] A female gambler. Davies.

To two characters, hitherto thought the most contradictory, the sentimental and the flirting, she unites yet a third: . . . this, I need not tell you, is that of a gamestress.

Miss Burney, Cecilia, I. 6.

gametal (gām'e-tal), a. [< gameta + -al.] Having the character of a gamete; conjugating; reproductive; generative.

The presence of the reproductive elements exerts a constant stimulus upon the brain cells, which causes them to generate characteristic dreams, that in turn react to produce copulation of the gametal cells.

J. Nelson, Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 300.

gametangium (gām'e-tan-jū'm), n.; pl. gametangia (-jā). [NL., < Gr. gamēta, a wife, gamēta, a husband, < gamō, marry, < gamō, marriage.] In bot., a propagative protoplasmic body which unites with a similar or dissimilar body to form a spore, called a zygote, the latter being either a zygospore or an oospore. Mobile gametes resembling zoospores are called planogametes or zoogametes.

The two cells which conjugate to form it (a zygospore) are spoken of as gametes planogametes when they produce cilia, and gametes when they do not.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 525.

gametophyte (gam'e-tō-fit), n. [Gr. γαῖνή, a wife, γαῖνή, a husband (see gamele), + φύτον, a plant.] In thallophytes, the sexual form of the plant, as distinguished from the sporophyte, or asexual form.

gamey, a. A less correct spelling of gamy.
gamic (gam'ik), a. and n. [Gr. γαμικός, of or for marriage, < γάμος, marriage.] 1. a. Having a sexual character; sexual: opposed to agamic: said specifically of an ovum.

In each ovarium, along with the rudiments of agamic eggs, or eggs which, if developed, produce young by true parthenogenesis, there usually, if not always, exists the rudiment of an ephipelial egg; which, from sundry evidences, is inferred to be a sexual or gamic egg.

H. Spencer.

Gamic edges, corresponding edges of an antipolar polyhedron. If to every summit corresponds a face formed by the same number of edges, then to every edge connecting two summits corresponds a gamic edge, separating the two corresponding faces.

II. n. A gamic edge.

gamin (gam'in, F. pron. ga-mān'), n. [F., of obscure origin.] A neglected and precociously knowing street-boy; an unruly boy running about at his own will. Also called street Arab.

The word gamin was printed for the first time, and passed from the populace into literature, in 1834. It made its first appearance in a work called Claude l'Écuyer: the scandal was great, but the word has remained. . . . The gamin of Paris at the present day, like the Graculus of Rome in former times, is the youthful people with the wrinkle of the old world on its forehead.

Victor Hugo, Les Misérables (trans.).

It would seem as if there were a gamin element in the character of Irishmen. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 469.

gaming (ga'ming), n. [Verbal n. of game, v.] Playing for stakes; gambling. In law (a) An agreement between two or more to risk money on a contest or chance of any kind where one must be a loser and the other a winner. (b) More specifically, any sport or play carried on by two or more persons, depending on skill, chance, or the occurrence of an unknown future event, on the result of which some valuable thing is, without other consideration, to be transferred from the one to the other, or which in its course or consequences involves some other thing demoralizing or unlawful. Bishop

When he is drunk, asleep, or in his rage;

At gaming, swearing; or about some act

That has no relish of salvation in it.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 3.

In the common usage of the two terms "betting" and "gaming," they may sometimes be employed interchangeably, but not always. If two persons play at cards for money, they are said to be gambling or gaming; but they are gambling because they lay a wager or make a bet on the result of the game, and therefore to say they are betting is equally appropriate. If two persons lay a wager upon the result of a pending election, it will be said that they are betting, but not that they are gaming. There is no gaming in which the element of the wager is wanting, but there is betting which the term gaming is not commonly made to embrace.

Justice T. M. Cooley.

gaming-house (ga'ming-hous), n. A house where gaming is practised; a gambling-house; a hell. Common gaming-house. See common.

gaming-room (ga'ming-rōm), n. A room kept for the purpose of gaming or gambling.

It being found, then, that the pooling schemes contemplated gaming, it remains to see whether the room which is kept for the purposes of the schemes is to be held a gaming-room. People vs. Weithoff, 5 Mich., p. 283.

gaming-table (ga'ming-tā'bl), n. A table used or especially adapted for use in gaming or gambling.

He's done him to a gamin's table

Hear of Laine (Child's Ballads, VIII. 76).

A jest calculated to spread at a gaming table may be received with a perfect neutrality of face, should it happen to drop in a mackerel boat. Goldsmith, The Rev., No. 1.

gamla (gam'la), n. Same as gamlah.

gamma (gam'ā), n. [L. gamma, < Gr. γάμμα, of Phenician origin, Heb. gimel: see g, and cf. digamma. In def. 3, ME. gamme, < OF. gamme, game = Sp. gama = Pg. It. gamma = Icel. gammi, < ML. gamma, the gamut: see gamut.] 1. The third letter of the Greek alphabet, Γ, γ, represented historically by ε, phonetically by g, in the Roman and English alphabet. 2. In entom., a common European noctuid moth of the family Plutellidae, Plutella gamma. Also called silver-Y and gamma-moth, from the shape of a silvery spot on the wing, like that of Greek gamma, γ, or English Y. The larva feeds on various low plants. 3. Same as gamut. Gamma function, a function so called because usually written Γ where x is the variable, and most clearly defined by the equation

$$\Gamma x = \lim_{n \rightarrow \infty} \left(\frac{1}{x} - \frac{1}{x+1} + \frac{1}{x+2} - \frac{1}{x+3} + \dots + \frac{1}{x+n} \right) \text{ for } x > 0.$$

gammadion (ga-mā'di-on), n.: pl. gammadia (-ā). [Mit. γανδάριον, var. of γαμμάριον, dim. of Gr. γάμμα, gamma: see gamma.] An ornament on ecclesiastical vestments resembling the Greek capital gamma (Γ) in shape. Usually in the plural, four gammadia in different positions being placed back to back so as to form a voided Greek cross. This ornament was formerly frequent on certain vestments of Greek prelates, and was also used on vestments in the Western Church. Also gammadion.

gamma-moth (gam'ā-mōth), n. Same as gamma, 2.

gammurid (gam'ā-rid), n. An amphipod of the family Gammaridae.

Gammaridae (ga-mar'ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gammarus + -idae.] A large family of genuine amphipods, containing numerous aquatic and mostly marine forms, with large antennulae frequently branched, the second ramus longer than the shaft of the antennae, and broad coxal plates of the four anterior legs. These beach-fleas move by swimming rather than springing.

During the Rogation, or, as they were then better called, the gang days, and whenever any smart evil had befallen this land, our clergy and people went a procession through the streets of the town, and about the fields of the country parishes. [Rock, Church of our Fathers, III, 172.]

gang-drill (gang'dril), n. A machine tool containing in one head a number of vertical drills, each having its separate belt and pulley from a common shaft, and with speed-pulleys common to all.

gange (ganj), v. t.; pret. and pp. ganged, ppr. ganging. To fasten (a fish-hook) to the end of a section of line called the ganging. There are many methods of ganging. For hand-lines for cod a single strand of line about two feet long is doubled, and its right end is placed in the shank of a hook, after which the ends are laid together and a single wall-knot is tied in the end of the ganging. Hooks to be used on half-but trawl-lines are seized to the ends of the ganging with tarred or waxed twine. Cod trawl-hooks are generally provided with an eye at the upper end of the shank. A common way of ganging such hooks is to pass the end of the ganging through the eye of the hook, like threading a needle, and then make a figure of eight knot around the standing part of the line. Hooks for such predaceous and sharp toothed fish as the bluefish and kingfish are often ganged with wire, and those for sharks with an iron chain.

gang-edger (gang'edj'er), n. A machine having from three to six circular saws on a common mandrel, capable of being so adjusted as to slit wide planks into boards or scantlings of the width required.

The stringhalt will gae off when it's gae a mile; it's a wee I ken'd ganger, they ca' it simple Tam.
[Scott, Rob Roy, xviii.]

2. One who conducts or superintends a gang or squad, as the foreman of a gang of laborers or plate-layers on a railway. [Eng.]

On Saturday evening a man named Charles Frost, a ganger in the employ of the Midland Railway Company, was run over.
[Leeds Mercury, May 8, 1881.]

A ganger, or head maver, accustomed to receive him his own results produced by great physical energy and untiring strength, he placed over hundreds of men.
[W. H. Russell, Days in India, II, 109.]

3. In coal-mining, one who is employed in conveying the coal through the gangways. [Midland coal-field, Eng.].—4. Naut., a length of chain, one end of which is fastened to an anchor when let go, when the other end is fastened to a hawser.

Gangetic (gan-jet'ik), a. [< L. Gangeticus, < Ganges, < Gr. Γανγης, < Skt. (> Hind.) Ganga, Ganges.] Of or pertaining to the river (Ganges) in India, or to the region through which it flows; as, Gangetic cities; Gangetic river-system. Also Gangue.

There [in India] he went gunting for gangetic crocodiles.
[The American, XI, 168.]

gang-farmert, gong-farmert, n. [ME. gong-farmer, -formar, -fermeron, etc.] A cleaner of privies. [Palsgrave.]

gang-flower (gang'flou'ér), n. The milkwort, Polygala vulgaris; so named from its blossoming in gang-week.

Gangic (gan'jik), a. [< Ganges + -ic.] Same as Gangetic. [Rare.]

Doubt has his deeds are such, as would I sing
But half of them, I vnder take a thing
As hard almost as in the Gangic seas
To count the Waves, or Sands in Euphrates [Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas, Weeks, II, The Lawe]

ganging (gan'jing), n. 1. The act or mode of fastening a fish-hook to the line.—2. A section or part of a fishing-line to the free end of which a hook is ganged; a ganging-line. The ganging is sometimes of wire or chain, as for catching sharks; and all sizes of line are used, from fine silk thread up to the largest cord that will take a hook.

ganging-line (gan'jing-lin), n. The ganging of a fishing-line, especially when different from the rest of the line.

ganging-plea (gang'ing-plē), n. A long-continued suit; a permanent or hereditary litigation. [Scotch.]

But I thought ye had some law affair of your ain to look after; I have am myself a ganging-plea that my father left me, and his father afore left to him.
[Scott, Antiquary, II.]

ganglia, n. Latin plural of ganglion.

gangliac (gang'gli-ak), a. [< gangli-on + -ac.] Same as gangliat.

gangliat (gang'gli-at), a. [< gangli-on + -at.] Relating to a ganglion or ganglia; ganglionic.

gangliar (gang'gli-är), a. [< gangli-on + -är.] Same as gangliat.

Very peculiar round or biscuit-formed bodies, probably not gangliar in their nature.
[G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 215.]

gangliate, gangliated (gang'gli-ät, -ät-ed), a. Provided with a ganglion or with ganglia; ganglionated; knotted, as a nerve or lymphatic. Also ganglionated.

gangliiform, ganglioform (gang'gli-förm, -ö-förm), a. [< Gr. γέλιον, a tumor, + L. forma, shape.] Having the form or character of a ganglion; resembling a ganglion.

gangling (gang'gling), a. [*Prop. ppr. of gangle, freq. of gang, go. (> Gangrel).] Awkward and sprawling in walking; loose-jointed. [Colloq.]

They [antelope fawns] are not nearly so pretty as deer fawns, having long gangling legs and angular bodies.

[T. Russell, Hunting Trips, p. 202.]

ganglioform (gang'li-ö-förm), a. See gangliiform.

ganglion (gang'gli-on), n.; pl. ganglions, ganglia (-ganz, -ä). [< L. ganglion, a tumor, < Gr. γάγγλιον, a tumor under the skin, on or near a tendon.] 1. An enlargement in the course of a nerve, containing or consisting of a collection of ganglion-cells; any assembly of ganglion-cells. The nervous system of invertebrates generally, and the sympathetic nervous system of vertebrates, consists essentially of a chain or series of ganglia connected by commissures, giving off filaments in various directions, forming plexuses or networks around principal viscera, blood vessels, and other important organs. Some of the larger sympathetic ganglia are also called plexuses, thus, the solar plexus of the abdomen forms the solar plexus. In the cerebrospinal nervous system of vertebrates, ganglia regularly occur on the posterior or sensory roots of the spinal nerve. There are likewise ganglia upon some of the motor or sensorimotor cranial nerves, as the vagus, fifth, and facial. All the masses of gray neurine in the brain are also ganglia, as the optic thalamus, corpora quadrigemina, corpora striata, etc.; even the general mass of cortical gray matter, both of the cerebrum and of the cerebellum, constitutes a great ganglion. The principal ganglia have special names. See the phrases below.

2. A knot or enlargement on a lymphatic; a lymphatic gland. See ent under lymphatic.—3. In pathol.: (a) An encysted enlargement in connection with the sheath of a tendon: called simple ganglion. (b) Inflammation, with effusion into one or more sheaths of tendons: called diffuse ganglion. (c) An enlarged bursa. [Rare.]—4. In bot., the mycelium of certain fungi. [Imp. Diet.—Andersch's ganglion, the petrous ganglion, named from Andersch, a German anatomist who lived at the close of the eighteenth century.—Arnold's ganglion, the otic ganglion.

Basal ganglia, ganglia lying at the base of the cerebrum, including the corpora striata, optic thalamus, corpora geniculata, corpora quadrigemina, bed nigrum, and nuclei tegmenti. Basal optic ganglion, a collection of nerve-cells by the side of the infundibulum, close to the optic tract. Branchial ganglion. See branchial.—Buccal ganglia. See buccal. Cardiac ganglion of Wrisberg, a ganglion in the cardiac plexus of sympathetic nerves.—Carotid ganglion. See carotid.—Casserian ganglion. See Casserian.—Cephalic ganglia, those sympathetic ganglia which are situated in the head and are connected with the divisions of the fifth nerve. In man they are four, the olivary, sphenopalatine, otic, and submaxillary. Some small swellings, as the carotid ganglion, are not included in this enumeration, though situated in the head.

Cerebellar ganglion, or ganglion of the cerebellum. Same as corpus dentatum (q) (which see, under corpus).—Cerebral ganglia. See cerebral.—Cervical ganglia, sympathetic ganglia in the neck. In man there are three, superior, middle, and inferior, the first of which is a large reddish-gray cigar-shaped swelling lying behind the sheath of the carotid artery. Ciliary ganglion, a small sympathetic ganglion situated in the orbit of the eye, in close relation with the ophthalmic artery, connected with the cavernous plexus of the sympathetic system, with the third nerve and the ophthalmic division of the fifth nerve, and giving off a number of delicate filaments constituting the short ciliary nerves. Also called lenticular ganglion and ophthalmic ganglion.—Diaphragmatic ganglion, a small ganglion under the diaphragm, marking the junction of filaments from the right phrenic nerve with the phrenic plexus. Also called phrenic ganglion.

Facial ganglion, a ganglionic swelling of the facial nerve, where this nerve communicates with Meckel's and Arnold's ganglia by means of the petrosal nerves. Also called intumescentia gangliiformis and geniculate ganglion. Ganglion impar, the unpaired or arygous ganglion, the single ganglion in which the two chains or series of sympathetic ganglia terminate posteriorly; the end of the sympathetic system behind.—Ganglion inferius, the inferior ganglion of the trunk of the pneumogastric nerve, as distinguished from the ganglion of the root of the same nerve.—Ganglion infra-oesophageum, a ganglion situated below the oesophagus, as in mollusks.—Ganglion of Bochdalek, a swelling at the point of communication of a posterior nasal branch of the sphenopalatine ganglion with the anterior dental nerve.—Ganglion of Ribes, a small unpaired ganglion of the sympathetic system, supposed to be situated on the anterior communicating artery of the circle of Willis at the base of the brain, and to constitute the anterior termination of the whole chain of ganglia of the sympathetic system, corresponding to the ganglion impar at the other end of this system.—Ganglion of Wrisberg. See cardiac ganglion.—Ganglion spirale, the gangliiform swelling of the cochlear nerve which fills the spiral canal of the modiolus of the cochlea.—Ganglion stellatum, in Cephalopoda, a large nervous ganglion into which is received a nerve from each parietal-pleuronic ganglion.—Ganglion supra-oesophageum, the supra-oesophageal ganglion, a ganglion situated above the oesophagus, as in mollusks.—Casserian ganglion or Casser's ganglion [named from A. P. Casser, a German physician (1802-77)], a ganglion of the sensory portion of the root of the fifth cranial nerve, just back of its division into its three main branches, ophthalmic and superior and inferior maxillary; it is lodged on a depression upon the apex of the petrosal bone. Also called by mistake the Casserian ganglion (supposed to refer to Giulio Casserio, an Italian anatomist, died 1610).—Geniculate ganglion. Same as facial ganglion.—Glossopharyngeal ganglia, the two gangliiform enlargements of the glossopharyngeal nerve, one called the ganglion, the other the petrosus.—Intercarotid ganglion, a small swelling on the carotid plexus at the bifurcation of the common carotid arteries.—Intercerebral ganglion, a swelling on the ganister (gan'is-ter), n. [Also ganntier; G. fr. dial. ganster, Mitt. ganster, gänster, gänster, ganster, ganster, etc., a spark (see gnast); so called because the ganister beds are so siliceous that it is easy to strike fire with the rock of which they are made up.] In mining and metal, a hard, siliceous rock forming the floor of some coal-seams in England. It is used as a refractory material, and also for flagging. (Ganister is also artificially made by mixing ground quartz and fire-clay; this artificial form is used for lining Bessemer converters. Calcined, pulverized, and sifted ganister is used on a straight buff-slicked bull neck leather to smooth the threaded shoulders of work-knives after they have been filed. — Ganister beds, a series of beds in the northern counties of England, immediately over the millstone-grit, belonging to the lower coal measures; they produce excellent flagstones. One seam of coal in England is called the ganister coal, because it almost always has a ganister floor. Hence the name ganister beds has been given to the lower coal-measures.

ganjah (gan'jā), n. [Also written gunjah, repr. Hind. ganja or ganjha, the hemp-plant.] The hemp-plant of the north of India; specifically, the dried plant which has flowered, and from which the resin has not been removed, used for smoking like tobacco. Also called ganja.

gannon (gan'en), n. [E. dial., perhaps for gang-ing, a going; see gang, gangway.] In coal-mining, a broad heading or incline, down which coal is conveyed in tubs running on rails. (Gresley. [North. Eng.]) ganner (gan'or), n. A dialectal form of gander. gannet (gan'et), n. [ME. gannet*, found only in contr. gant, gantle, < AS. gannot, gannot, a new-fowl, = D. gan, a gander, = M.H.G. gan, a gander, = OH.G. ganazzo, M.H.G. ganze, a gander (cf. L. ganta (Pliny), a goose, > OE. ganta = Pg. Pr. ganta; of Teut. origin); < gan, in gander, and goose (cf. gans, etc.) + suffix -et, -et.] 1. The solan-geese, Sula bassana, a large totipalmate swimming bird of the family Sulidae and order Steganopodes. It is about 3 feet long and 6 feet in stretch of wings, and of a white color tinged with amber yellow on the head, with black primaries.

Gannet (Sula bassana), adult and young

It inhabits the Atlantic coasts of Europe and North America, feeds on fish, which it catches by pouncing down upon them from high, and congregates in vast numbers to breed in certain rocky places on the seacoast. It is a strong flier, but is not found far from land. Some of the principal breeding places are the Hebrides, St. Kilda, Alton Craig, and the Bass Rock, on the European coast, and the "Gannet Rock," in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The flesh is rank, but the young are sometimes eaten, and the old birds are taken in numbers for their feathers.

2. pl. The birds of the family Sulidae; the boobies, of which there are several species, of the genera Sula and Dysporus.

Ganocephala (gan-o-sef'a-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ganocephalus; see ganocephalus.] An order of extinct labyrinthodont amphibians. The endoskeleton is notochordal and osseous, the bodies of the vertebrae are each represented by a basal intercentrum and a pair of pleurocentra, there is no occipital condyle; the vomer is divided, the temporal fossae are over-arched by bone; and the head is covered with polished horny or ganoid plates, whence the name. The genera Archegonius and Heudrerpeton are added by Owen as examples of this order.

Owen has distinguished the oldest forms of labyrinthodonts with armoured skull as Ganocephala. (Claus, Zoology (trans.), II, 158) ganocephalous (gan-o-sef'a-lus), a. [< NL. ganocephalus, < Gr. gano, brightness, sheen, luster, + kephalē, the head.] Having the head covered with shining polished plates; specifically, having the characters of the Ganocephala.

Ganodus (gan'o-dus), n. [NL. (so named from the polish of the teeth), < Gr. gano, brightness, sheen, luster, + odus (ádor-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil chitimeroid fishes.

ganoid (gan'oid), a. and n. [< Gr. gano, brightness, sheen, luster, + eidos, appearance.] 1. a. Having a smooth, shining surface, as if polished or enameled; specifically applied to those scales or plates of fishes which are generally of an angular form and composed of a bony or hard horny tissue overlaid with enamel. See out under scale. — 2. Having ganoid scales or plates, as a fish; specifically, of or pertaining to the Ganoidi; as, a ganoid fauna.

II. n. One of the Ganoidi; a fish of the order Ganoidi.

Also ganoidian, ganoidian.

The ganoidi are an ancient group, well developed in the paleozoic rocks, but now dying out. The fossil genera are numerous and the species highly differentiated, but to-day only eight genera and between thirty and forty species comprise the ganoid fauna of the world.

Stand. Nat. Hist., III, 91.

ganoidial (ga-noi'dē-ā), a. [< ganoid + -al.] Same as ganoid.

Ganoides (ga-noi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Ganoidi, 2.

ganoidian (ga-noi'dē-ān), a. and n. Same as ganoid.

Ganoidi (ga-noi'dē-i), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ganoides; see ganoid.] 1. In Agassiz's system of classification, one of four orders into which the class of fishes was divided. It contained those which have ganoid scales or plates of an angular, rhomboidal, polygonal, or subcircular form, as distinguished from those with placoid, cycloid, or ctenoid scales. As thus framed by Agassiz, the ganoidi were an artificial group, including alurids, pleurogathi, lophobranchia, and other teleost fishes. By Owen the Ganoidi were divided into two suborders, Lepidoganoidei and Placoganoidei. By later authors the group has been restricted and raised to the rank of a subclass.

Hence—2. In Müller's system, a subclass of fishes with muscular or multivalvular aortic bulb, free branchia, covered gill-cavity, and no optic chiasm, a spiral intestinal valve (sometimes rudimentary), and usually fulcrum on one or more fins. It was divided by Müller into two orders: Chondrostei, with a cartilaginous skeleton, as the sturgeons and paddle-fishes, and Holostei, with bony skeleton, as the Polypteridae, Lepidosteidae, Amiidae, and many extinct forms. Each one of the existing families of ganoida has been made the type of an order by late writers. Thus, the sturgeons (Acipenseridae) typify the order Chondrostei in a restricted sense, or Glanostomi, the paddle-fishes (Polyodontidae or Spatulariidae), the order Seiastomati; the bichirs (Polypteridae), the order Crossopterygii or Actinistia, the bony pikies or garra (Lepidosteidae), the order Rhomboganoidei or Ginglymidae, and the bowfins (Amiidae), the order Cycloganoidei or Halecomphs. Besides these there are three extinct orders, Acanthodii, Placodermi, and Pycnodontii. The ganoida abounded in former geologic periods, as far back as the Silurian; but the few above named are the only extant types. See ganoid, n. Also Ganoida.

ganoidian (ga-noi'dē-ān), a. and n. Same as ganoid.

ganoin (gan'o-in), n. [< Gr. gano, brightness, sheen, luster (see ganoid), + -in.] The peculiar bony tissue which gives the enamel-like luster and transparency to the plates of ganoid fishes and of some labyrinthodonts. It is simply dense homogeneous bone.

ganomalite (ga-nom'a-lit), n. [< Gr. gano, brightness, brilliancy (< gano, make bright, gano, brightness, sheen, luster), + malos, stone.] A rare silicate of lead and manganese, occurring massive, white or gray in color, at Långban in Sweden.

gant¹ (gant), a. An obsolete or dialectal form of *gant*².

gant², gaunt² (gänt), v. i. [A var. of *gan*³, gan (AS. gāntian); see *gan*³, yawn.] To yawn. [Scotch.]

Gaunting holes wanting one of three.
Meat, sleep, or good company. Scotch proverb.

gantle (gan'tō-in), n. [< F. gant, a glove (see gantlet), + -le + -in.] A spongy composition, used to clean kid and other leather gloves, composed of small shavings of curd soap 1 part, water 3 parts, and essence of citron 1 part.

gantlet¹ (gänt'let), n. Another spelling of *gantlet*².

gantlet², gauntlet² (gänt'let), n. [More correctly gantlope (q. v.), corrupted to gantlet or gantlet by confusion with *gantlet*¹, *gauntlet*¹, a glove (there being some vague association with 'throwing down the gauntlet' in challenge); the proper form would be gantlop*, or, accorn. to E., gantlope*, < Sw. gantlop (= G. gantlopfen), lit. a 'gate-leap,' i. e., a 'lane-run,' in the phrase lantlop gantlop, run the gantlet (cf. Icel. götukskrif, a thief punished by the gantlet); < Sw. gata, a street, lane (= G. gasse = E. gate), + lopp, a running, course, career, < lopt = G. laufen = E. leap, run; see *gate*², *leap*¹, and lope.] 1. A military punishment formerly inflicted for heinous offenses, in which the offender, stripped to his waist, was compelled to run a certain number of times through a lane formed by two rows of men standing face to face, each of them armed with a switch or other weapon with which he struck the offender as he passed; also, such a punishment used on board of ships, and, by extension, any similar punishment (used by some savage tribes and in Russia). Among the North American Indians this was a favorite mode of torturing prisoners of war, who often died under it. The Indians struck their victims with clubs, knives, lances, or any other convenient weapon.

Hence—2. A series or course of things or events. See to run the gantlet (b), below.—3. In railway engin., the running together of parallel tracks into the space occupied by one, by crossing the two inner rails so as to bring each side by side with the opposite outer rail. It is used chiefly to enable a double-track railroad to pass a single-track tunnel or bridge without breaking the continuity of either rail.—To run the gantlet. (a) To undergo the punishment of the gantlet. See def. 1. Hence—(b) To be exposed or to expose one's self to a course or series of disagreeable or unpleasant treatment or observations, remarks, criticisms, etc. Also sometimes to pass the gantlet.

To print is to run the gantlet and to expose one's self to the tongues-strapped.

Glennville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, Pref.

Charles passes the gauntlet of curious eyes down the aisle of the arbor. W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 72.

gantlette (gänt'let), n. Same as *gantlet*¹.

gant-line (gänt'lin), n. [< gant (uncertain) + line. Cf. girl-line.] Same as girl-line.

gantlope (gänt'löp), n. The earlier and less corrupt form of *gantlet*².

He is fain to run the gantlope through the terrors and reproaches of his own conscience. J. Scott, Hermon (1680).

Some said he ought to be tied neck and heels; others, that he deserved to run the gantlope.

Fielding, Tom Jones, [vii 11]

gantry, gantree (gan'tri, -tree), n. Same as gantra.

Ganymede (gan'i-mēd), n. [< L. Ganymedes, < Gr. Ganymēdes.] 1. In Gr. myth., the cup-bearer of Zeus or of the Olympian gods, originally a beautiful Trojan youth, transferred to Olympus (according to Homer by the gods, according to others by the eagle of Zeus or by Zeus himself in the form of an eagle), and made immortal. He supplanted Hebe in her functions as cup-bearer. He was regarded at first as the genius of water, and is represented by the sign Aquarius in the zodiac.

Or else flushed Ganymede, his rosy thigh
Half buried in the Eagle's down,
Sole as a flying star shot thro' the sky.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

Ganymede and the Eagle.—Museo Nazionale, Naples.

Or else flushed Ganymede, his rosy thigh
Half buried in the Eagle's down,
Sole as a flying star shot thro' the sky.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

2. Figuratively, a cup-bearer; a waiter.

Nature's self is thy Ganymede Cordley, Anacreontics, The Grasshopper.

ganza (gan'zā), n. [Sp. ganzo, m., gander, ganza, f., goose, < Goth. gans* = OH.G. gans = E. goose; see goose, gander, gannet.] One of the birds (a sort of wild goose) which, in Cyrano de Bergerac's "Comic History of the Moon" (1649), are represented as drawing thither the chariot of the Spanish adventurer Dominicus Gonzales.

They are but idle dreams and fancies,
And scarce strongly of the ganza.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II, lib. 761.

There are others, who have conjectured a possibility of being conveyed through the air by the help of fowls, to which purpose the fiction of the ganza is the most pleasant and probable.
Bp. Wilkins, Discalus, vii.

gaol, gaoler (jäl, jāl'er), n. Obsolete spellings of jail, jailer.

gaon (gä'on), n.; pl. gaanim. [Heb., exaltation, excellence.] A rabbinic doctor of the law. The name gaonim belongs exclusively to the presidents of the academies of Sora and Pumbeditha, in Babylonia, from A. D. 637 to 1084 and 1088.

gap (gap), n. [< ME. gap, gappe, < Icel. gap = Sw. gap = Dan. gab, a gap, opening, breach, chasm, mouth, throat, < Icel. Sw. gapa, Dan. gabe, yawn, gape; see gape.] 1. A break or opening, as in a fence, a wall, or the like; a breach; a chasm; a way of passage, as between rocks or through a mountain; a vacant space.

And stoppe none and deliver Alle the gappes of the bay [bridge].
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4022.

By these means I leave no gap for heresy, schism, or error.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 4.

From the gaps and chasms
Came men and women in dark clusters round.
Tennyson, Sea Drums.

Specifically—2. A deep sloping ravine, notch, or cleft cutting a mountain-ridge. The term is especially common in the central portion of the Appalachian range, where such openings are of frequent occurrence and are important features in the topography. The principal gaps have specific names, as Manassas Gap and Thoroughfare Gap in Virginia. Where such a gap is a through cut, penetrating to the mountain's base, and giving passage, as it then usually does, to a stream, it is called a water-gap, as the Delaware Water-gap in Pennsylvania, when it indents only the upper part of the ridge, it is called a wind-gap. See notch.

3. In general, any hiatus, breach, or interruption of consecutiveness or continuity; as, a gap in an argument.

If you violently proceed against him, mistaking his purpose, it would make a great gap in your own honour.

Shak., Lea, l. 2.

It is seldom that the scheme of his [St. Paul's] discourse makes any gap.
Locke, Epistle to Galatians, Pref.

There was no gap, no breach, no unrecorded intermediate state of things, between the end of the Roman power and the beginning of the Teutonic power.
E. A. Freeman, Amor. Lects., p. 122.

4. See the extract, and break-lathe.

A gap is an expedient for . . . enabling a lathe to take in articles of much greater diameter . . . without materially increasing its weight or general dimensions.
C. P. B. Shadley, Workshop Appliances, p. 108.

Foller gap. See foliar.—To stand in the gap, to expose one's self for the protection of something, be prepared to resist assault or ward off danger.

I sought for a man . . . that should . . . stand in the gap before me for the land, that I should not destroy it.
Ezek. xlii. 30.

To stop a gap, to secure a weak point; repair a defect; supply a temporary expedient.

His policy consists in setting traps,
In finding ways and means, and stopping gaps.
Swift.

gap (gap), v. t.; pret. and pp. gapped, ppr. gapping. [<gap, n.] 1. To notch or jag; cut into teeth like those of a saw.

He [uncle Toby] had no conception that the thing was any more to be made a mystery of than if Mrs. Wadman had given him a cut with a gapped knife.

Stearns, Tristram Shandy vi. 35.

I will never meet at hard-edge with her; if I did . . . I should be confoundedly gapped.
Richardson, St. Charles Grandison, l. 150.

2. To make a break or opening in, as a fence, a wall, or any mass of matter.

Ready: take aim at their heads;—their masses are gapped with our grape. Tennyson, Defence of Lucknow, li.

3. To cause a hiatus of any kind in; cause to lose consecutiveness or continuity.

If we omit the acut tones, these notes will represent the five keys of the gapped scale; if we do not omit them, we have the five melodic families of tones, which like the gapped scale, were developed from a circle of fifths.
W. K. Sullivan, Int. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. dxxliii.

gape (gāp or gāp), v. i.; pret. and pp. gaped, ppr. gaping. [*<ME. gāpen, appar. not <AS. *gapan, or gapan, which occurs but once in a doubtful gloss "grapan, pandere," connected with gap or gāp, wide, broad, spacious, used only in poetry, but of Scand. origin, like the related gap: < Icel. gapa = Sw. gapa = Dan. gabe = D. gāpen = MHG. gaffen, G. gaffen, gape, yawn. Cf. gap, n.] 1. To open the mouth involuntarily or as the result of weariness, sleepiness, or absorbed attention; yawn.

Gape not too wide, lest you disfigure your tunic.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

According to the inducing cause of the gaping, the verb, without losing its literal meaning, usually takes on an additional specific sense. (a) To yawn from sleepiness, weariness, or dullness.

She stretches, gapes, unglues her eyes,
And asks if it be time to rise.
Swift.

(b) To open the mouth for food, as young birds.
(c) To open the mouth in eager expectation; expect, await, or hope for, with the intent to receive or devour. See phrases below.

They have gaped upon me with their mouth.

Job xvi. 30.

Others still gape 't anticipate
The cabinet-designs of fate.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. III. 25.

(d) To stand with open mouth in wonder, astonishment, or admiration; stand and gaze; stare. See phrases below, and gaping.

When y came to that court y gaped about.
Piers Plowman's Creed (E. E. T. 8), l. 150.

Don't stand gaping, but live and learn, my lad.

Maule, Lying Lover, l. 1.

2. To open as a gap, fissure, or chasm; split open; become fissured; show a fissure.

I marvel the ground gapes not and devours us.
Latimer, 5th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1540.

May that ground gape, and swallow me alive.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., l. 1.

Oh, but your wounds,
How fearfully they gape! and every one
To me is a sepulchre. Fletcher, Sea Voyage, II. 1.

He could see . . .

A cavern 'mid the cliff gaped ghastly.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 300.

To gape after. (a) To stare at in wonder, as at something which has just passed by. (b) To stand in eager expectation of; covet; desire; long for.

Burton, Anat., of Mel., p. 230.

What shall we say of those who spend days in gaping after court favour and preferment? Sir R. L. Estlin.

To gape at. (a) To stare at in wonder.

Ye fools, that wear gay clothes, love to be gaped at,
What are you better when your end calls on you?
Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, III. 2.

The man that's hang'd preaches his end,
And sits a sign for all the world to gape at.
Fletcher, Houdouin, IV. 3.

(b) To covet; desire; long for.

Many have gaped at the church revenues; but, before they could swallow them, have had their mouths stopped in the churchyard.
South, Sermons.

To gape for or upon, to stand in eager expectation of; be ready to take, seize, or devour.

All men know that we be here gathered, and with most fervent desire they anheale, breathe, and gape for the fruit of our convocation.
Latimer, Sermons and Remains, l. 61.

Only the lazy sluggish yawning lies Before thy threshold gapes for thy dole.
Cassio, Orion Britannicum.

The thirsty Earth winks up the Rain,
And drinks, and gapes for Drink again.
Cowley, Amor. eccl., II.

Thou, who gapes at my estate, draw near,
For I would whisper somewhat in thy ear.
Dryden, tr. of Persius.

Syn. 1. Gaze, etc. See stare.

gaper (gā' or gā'per), n. 1. One who gapes, as from sleepiness, drowsiness, or dullness, or in wonder, astonishment, longing desire, or expectation.

As I am a gentleman,

I have not seen such such a gaper; they follow him like a prize—there's no true gaper like to your gaper.
Fletcher (and another), Scots Gentleman, III. 2.

2. In ornith.: (a) One of the Eurylaimidae; a broadbill; as, the blue-billed gaper, Cymbirhynchus macrorhynchus. See cut in next column. (b) pl. Fissirostral birds, as swallows and the like; a literal translation of Hantou, one of the names of the old group Fissirostris.

—3. The Serranus cabrilla, a fish of the family Serranidae. So called because the fish in its death agony erects its fins and opens its mouth and thus affords, as is commonly seen in many of the spiny-rayed acanthopterygian fishes. Dry. Also called comber.

Blue-billed Gaper (Cymbirhynchus macrorhynchus).

4. A gaping clam; a bivalve mollusk of the family Myidae, as Aga truncata. It has a suboval shell, the valves of which gape or dispart and are truncated at the small end and swollen at the other. The surface is wrinkled concentrically and covered with a pale-greenish epidermis, which is continued over the siphon. It is a common inhabitant of the North Atlantic coast, and lives buried in the sand in an upright position, especially at the mouths of rivers and estuaries near low-water mark. At ebb-tide it shows its presence by a hole in the sand left when it withdraws its siphon, and it is found by digging to the depth of a foot or more. These clams are extensively used for the table and for bait. Along the eastern coast of the United States the gaper is commonly known as the soft clam, or in more northern ranges simply as the clam. (See cut under Myidae.) It has many synonyms in Great Britain: as, atthickwater pullet; at Southampton, odd maid; at Belfast, cockle brim; at Dublin, coller; at Youghal, super-lion. (c) The Pacific coast of the United States the term gaper is applied to various similar bivalves, as species of Glycymeris, Saxidomus, and Schistocheilus.

gape-seed (gāp'seed), n. That which induces gaping or staring; a cause of ignorant wonder or astonishment; a popular marvel. [Humorous.]

These [the Harlequin and Jack Puddings in Bartholomew Fair], they pretend to be thought fools, will not be the only fools there, but to be compared with those who, in an eager pursuit after diversion, stand with their eyes and their mouths open, to take in a cargo of gape-seed, while some a little too nimble for their pick their pockets.
Pierce Robin, 1755.

gaping (gā' or gā'ping), p. a. Standing wide open, as the mouth, or having the mouth wide open, as in wonder or admiration.

Into Robin Hood's gaping mouth
He prowl'd in powder some (doubt part).
Robin Hood and the Puddler (Child's Ballads, V. 247).

garancoux (gar-ron-sé), n. [F., < garance, madder.] A product obtained by treating the waste madder of the dye-houses, which still contains a certain quantity of alizarin and other coloring matters, with sulphuric acid, to remove lime, magnesia, etc. It is adapted for dyeing red and black, but does not afford a good purple.

garancin, garancine (gar-an-sin), n. [< F. garance = Sp. garanza = Pg. garança (ML. garancia, varantia), madder, origin unknown.] The product obtained by treating pulverized madder, previously exhausted with water, with concentrated sulphuric acid at 100° C. (212° F.), and again washing with water. The residue thus obtained is found to yield better results in dyeing than madder itself, the colors produced by it being more brilliant and requiring less after-treatment, while the parts of the fabric destined to be kept white attract hardly any color. Garancin style, in dyeing, same as madder style (see under madder).

garangan (gar-rang-gan), n. [E. Ind.] The Malay mongoose or ichneumon, Herpestes javanicus, of Java, Sumatra, and the Malay peninsula, abounding in the tank-forests, and preying upon small reptiles, birds, and quadrupeds.

Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 215.

garb², garbe (gärb), n. [< OF. garbe, jarbe, F. gerbe = Pr. Sp. garba, < OHG. garba, MHG. G. garbe = OS. garba = D. garf, garre, a sheaf, prop. a handful; perhaps ult. akin to Skt. √ garbh, seize.] A sheaf or bundle, as of grain or arrows; obsolete except in certain specific applications. In heraldry, a garb is a sheaf of any kind of grain, but specifically a sheaf of wheat. When other than wheat, the kind must be expressed. Formerly, a garb of arrows was a bundle of 24 arrows. A garb of steel consists of 30 blocks or ingots. Also gerbe.

Great Eupham's fertile glebe what tongue hath not extolled?
As though to her alone belong'd the garb of gold Drayton, Polyolbon, XIII. 270.

garbage (gärb'ä), n. [Formerly also garbush, garbidge; < ME. garbage, the entrails of fowls; origin unknown. The form is like OF. garbage, gerbage, ML. garbagum, a tribute or tax paid in sheaves, < OF. garbe, ML. garba, a sheaf (see garb²); there may be a connection similar to that shown in G. bundle, the entrails of fish, lit. a bundle, = E. bundle. There can be no connection with garble, a much later word in E., and one which could not have produced the form garbage.] 1. Originally, the entrails of fowls, and afterward of any animal; now, offal or refuse organic matter in general; especially, the refuse animal and vegetable matter from a kitchen.

This fountain was said to grow thick, and savour of garbage, at such time as they celebrated the Olympiads, and defiled the river with the blood and entrails of the sacrifice Sandars, Travels, p. 188.

Hence—2. Any worthless, offensive matter.

No lust, though to a radiant angel link'd,
Will sate itself in a celestial bed
And prey on garbage.
Shak., Hamlet, I. 5

To swallow up the garbage of the time
With greedy gulfs. B. J. non, Pastaster, Act 1

garbage² (gärb'ä), v. t. [Formerly also garbush, garbidge; < garbage, a.] To eviscerate; disembowel; gut; clean by removing the entrails of.

His cooks founde the same ring in the bealy of a fysh which he *garbage*d to dress for his lordes dinner.
Doyle, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 182

The white cats and many dogs that lived on them were fetched, and many of them, leaving the weeds, came down to their houses, and to such places where they use to garbish their fish, and became tame.
Quoted in Cape John Smith's Works, II. 141

gardon, n. and r. An obsolete form of garden.

gardyloo (gär'di-lö), n. [See also written gardenly; usually explained as F. gardez l'eau, or in less incorrect F. gardez-vous de l'eau, but the sense ('protect yourself from the water') does not suit, and the phrase is not found in F. The real origin is F. gare l'eau, used just like gardylon, lit. 'ware water!' i. e., look out for the water! also with added adverb gare l'eau là bas! 'ware water down there!' In these phrases gare is the impv. of gare, ware, beware, take heed of, shun, avoid. < MHG. wahren, G. wahren = E. ware, beware: see ware, v., beware, and cf. gare. For F. cau, water, see cau and ue.] Look out for the water: a cry formerly used in Edinburgh, Scotland, to warn passengers to beware of slops about to be thrown out of the window.

At ten o'clock at night (in Edinburgh) the whole cargo (of the chamber utensils) is hung out of a back window that looks into some street or lane, and the maid calls Gardyloo to the passengers.
Snodgett.

gare (gär), v. t. [Early mod. E. gare, ME. garen, gawren, appar. irreg. for garen*, of uncertain origin: either (1) < OF. garer, guarer, observe, keep watch, hold guard, < OHG. waron, take heed, guard (cf. OF. garer, guarer, preserve, keep, guard, < OHG. warian = OS. werman, guard: see ware, v. t.); or (2) another form of ME. garen, E. gaze (cf. dar = dare, front, town = trawen, etc.).] To stare; gaze; gape.

Age, we know,
Is garrulous; and solitude is apt
To anticipate the privilege of Age.

Wordsworth, Excursion, iii.

His [Leigh Hunt's] style . . . is well suited for light, garrulous, desultory work.

Mumford, Comic Dramatists of the Restoration.

Syn. Loquacious, etc. (see talkative), prattling, babbling.

garrulously (gar-'ū-lus-lī), adv. In a garrulous or talkative manner; chatteringly.

To whom the little novice garrulously,
"Yes, but I know—the land was full of signs
And wonders ere the coming of the Queen."

Tennyson, Guinevere.

garrulousness (gar-'ū-lus-nēs), n. Talkativeness.

Garrulus (gar-'ū-lus), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760), < L. garrulus, chattering; see garrulous.] The typical genus of jays of the subfamily Garrulinae. It was formerly coextensive with the subfamily, but is now restricted to the group of which the common crested jay of Europe, G. glandarius, is the best-known example. See cut under my.

garrupa (gar-'ū-plī), n. [Appar. a native Spanish-American name, of which grouper or grouper is an E. accommodation.] A grouper or group-er; applied to several different fishes, as scorpenoids and serranids, particularly to Sebastes nebulosus and S. atrovirens of the California coast.

Garrya (gar-'ī-ā), n. [NL., named after Garry, of the Hudson's Bay Company, who facilitated Douglas's botanical researches in northwestern America.] A genus of evergreen shrubs, of the order Cornaceae (originally placed by itself in an order Garryaceae), natives of North America from Oregon to Mexico and Texas, and of the West Indies. There are about a dozen species, with opposite leaves and drooping flower spikes like Salix. (G. elliptica, from California, is cultivated in England for ornament.)

garter (gär-'tēr), n. [< ME. garter, gartere, < OF. gartier, gartier, assimilated gartier, F. jarretière (> Sp. jarrieta = Pg. jarrieta = It. giarrietta, gerrietta), a garter, < OF. garret, assimilated jarret, F. jarret, the small of the leg behind the knee (> Sp. W. gardys, gardas, Gael. garten, a garter.] 1. A tie or fastening to keep the stocking in place on the leg; especially, a band passing round the leg, either above or below the knee.

Thy garters fringed with the gold,
And silver aglets hanging by.

Greenleaf (Child's Ballads, IV, 242).

Our Lombard country girls along the coast
Wear daggers in their garters.

D. G. Rossetti, A Last Confession.

2. The badge of the Order of the Garter (which see, below); hence, membership in the order; also [cap.], the order itself; as, to confer or to receive the garter, a knight of the Garter.

I would, base knight, when I did meet thee first,
To tear the garter from thy craven's leg (Which I have done), because unworthily
Thou wast installed in that high degree.

Shak, 1 Hen. VI, iv. 1.

3. In her., same as bendlet, 1: sometimes taken as occupying half the space of the bendlet, or quarter of the bend.—4. [cap.] An abbreviation of Garter king-at-arms (which see, below).—5. pl. In a circus, the tapes that are held up for a performer to leap over.

[The clown] offered at the garters four times last night, and never done 'em once.

Dickens.

6. A semicircular key in a bench-vice.—7. In printing, an iron band which prevented the splitting of the wooden box that resisted the impression-spindle of the old form of hand-press. Garter king-at-arms (often abbreviated to Garter), the chief herald of the Order of the Garter, who is also, under the authority of the earl marshal, the principal king-at-arms in England.—Order of the Garter, the highest order of knighthood in Great Britain, consisting of the sovereign, the Prince of Wales, and twenty-five knights companion, and open, in addition, to such English princes and foreign sovereigns as may be chosen, and sometimes to extra companions chosen for special reasons, so that the whole order usually numbers about fifty. Formerly the knights companion were elected by the body itself, but since the reign of George III. appointments have been made by the sovereign. The order, at first (and still sometimes) called the Order of St. George, was instituted by Edward III. some time between 1344 and 1350.

Order of the Garter—Star, Collar, and George.

tuted by Edward III. some time between 1344 and 1350, the uncertainty arising from the early loss of all its original records. Its purpose has been supposed to have been at first only temporary. According to the common legend, probably fictitious, King Edward III. picked up a garter dropped by the Countess of Salisbury at a ball, and placed it on his own knee, with the words to his courtiers, in response to the notice taken of the incident, Honi soit qui mal y pense (shamed be he who thinks evil of it). To this incident the foundation, the name, and the motto of the order are usually ascribed. The insignia of the order are the garter, a blue ribbon of velvet edged with gold and having a gold buckle, worn on the left leg; the badge, called the George or great George, a figure of St. George killing the dragon, pendant from the collar of gold, which has twenty-six pieces, each representing a collared garter; the lesser George, worn on a broad blue ribbon over the left shoulder; and the star of eight points of silver, having in the middle the cross of St. George encircled by the garter. The vesture consists of a mantle of blue velvet lined with white tulle, a hood and surcoat of crimson velvet, and a hat of black velvet with a plume of white ostrich feathers, having in the center a tuft of black heron feathers. When the sovereign is a woman she wears the ribbon on the left arm.—Prick the garter. See fast and loose, under fast.

garter (gär-'tēr), v. t. [< ME. garteren, < garter, n.] 1. To bind with a garter.

With a luten stock on one leg, and a kersey boot-hose on the other, gartered with a red and blue list.

Shak, 1. of the 8, iii. 2.

Now, I have taken occasion to garter my stockings before him, as if unworthy of him.

Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, iv. 1.

2. To invest with the garter, as a member of the Order of the Garter.

Tis the rich banker wins the fair.

The garter'd knight, or feather'd beau.

Somerville, To Phyllis.

garter-fish (gär-'tēr-fish), n. A name of the scabbard-fish (which see).

Garter-king (gär-'tēr-king), n. See Garter king-at-arms, under garter.

garter-plate (gär-'tēr-plāt), n. A plate of gilt copper upon which the arms of a knight of the garter are engraved, and which is fixed in the back of the scall of the knight in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. See scall-plate.

garter-ring (gär-'tēr-ring), n. A finger-ring made in imitation of a strap passing through a buckle and held by its tongue. Such rings dating from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and even earlier, are not uncommon. They have no relation to the Order of the Garter, but generally bear some religious motto.

garter-snake (gär-'tēr-snāk), n. The common name in the United States of the grass-snakes or ribbon-snakes of the genus Eutania, harmless and very pretty species of a greenish or brownish color with long yellow stripes. Two of the most abundant and best known are E. scutalis and E. scura; there are many more. See cut under Eutania.

garth (gärth), n. [< ME. garth, < local gærth, a yard, court, garden, = AS. geard, E. yard; see yard and garden, which are doublets of garth.] 1. A close; a yard; a garden.

Farre fro thi garth, thyne orchard, and thi vynn.

Polladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 87.

Caught at his hand, and wrung it passionately,

And past into the little garth beyond.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. A dam or weir for catching fish.

All & hail the salmon fisching and ether fische within the watter of Annoe—comprehending the garth and pullis vnder written, viz., the kingis garth, blak pale, etc.

Acts Jas. VI., 1600 (ed. 1814), p. 432.

garth (gärth), n. [E. dial., < ME. garth, another form of garth, > E. girth, q. s.] A hoop or band.

garthman (gärth-'man), n.; pl. garthmen (-men). The proprietor of an open weir for taking fish.

No fisher, or garth-man, nor any other, of what estate or condition that he be, shall from henceforth put in the waters of Thameis.

Quoted in Walton's Complete Angler, p. 62, note.

garuba (gar-'ū-bā), n. [S. Amer.] The name of a Brazilian eunatic-tailed parakeet of the genus Conurus, C. luteus, about 14½ inches long, and mostly yellow in color.

garum (gä-'rum), n. [L., < Gr. γάρον, earlier γάρον, a sauce made of brine and small fish, especially, among the Romans, the scumbe. A fish-sauce much prized by the ancients, made of small fish preserved in a certain kind of pickle; also, a pickle prepared from the gills or the blood of the tunny.

Yet is there one kind more of an exquisite and dainty liquor in manner of a dripping called garum, proceeding from the garbage of fishes, and such other offal as commonly the cooks useth to cast away. . . . In old times this sauce was made of that fish which the Greeks called garon.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxii. 7.

garvie (gär-'vi), n. [Sc., also garvock; < Gael. garbhag, a sprat, prob. < garbh, thick, coarse, rough.] A sprat; also, a pilchard. Also garvicherring.

garvock (gär-'vok), n. Same as garvie.

garzetta (gär-'zet-ā), n. [NL., < It. garzetta (< Sp. garzeta = Pg. garçota), dim. of garza, < Sp. garza = Pg. garça, a white heron, an egret.]

1. An old name of a small white heron or egret.

—2. [cap.] A genus of small white egrets. G.

Snowy Heron (Garzetta candidissima).

nirex is the common European species. G. candidissima is the corresponding American form.

gas (gas), n. [A word invented by the Belgian chemist Van Helmont (died 1644), who expressly says "Hunc spiritum, incognitum hactenus, novo nomine gas voco" (this vapor, hitherto unknown, I call by a new name, gas). The word came into general use: D. G. Dan. Sw. gas, F. Pg. gaz, Sp. It. gas, Russ. gas, Hind. gas, etc. Various guesses have been made at the word which might possibly have suggested the particular syllable gas, as D. geest (AS. gast, E. ghost), spirit; G. gäsch, froth, foam; Sw. gäsa, ferment, effervescence; F. gaze, gaze, etc.] 1.

A substance possessing perfect molecular mobility and the property of indefinite expansion. The term was originally synonymous with air, but was afterward applied to substances supposed (but wrongly—see below) to be incapable of reduction to a liquid or solid state. In accordance with this use a gas was defined to be a permanently elastic fluid or air differing from common air. According to the kinetic theory of gases, now accepted, the molecules of a gas are in a state of rapid motion in right lines, constantly colliding with one another and with the walls of any containing vessel, and hence exerting pressure against them. For example, in the case of air at ordinary temperatures it is calculated that the average velocity of the molecules is about that of a rifle-bullet as it leaves the gun. If a gas is compressed into less volume, the number of impacts against the sides of the containing vessel is inerased, and hence the pressure or tension increases, and conversely (Boyle's law). The temperature, according to this theory, is the average kinetic energy of a molecule; hence, increased temperature brings increased momentum, and so increased pressure on the walls of the vessel. This theory also explains many of the phenomena of viscosity, diffusion, etc. As increased pressure and diminished temperature (at least below the critical point) any gas can be reduced to the liquid form, the amount of pressure and degree of cold required differing widely with different gases. The so-called fixed or permanent gases, which were long supposed to be incompressible, as hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen, etc., yield only to extreme conditions of cold and pressure. There is no essential difference between a gas and a vapor (see vapor), but for convenience the latter name is given to the gaseous form of substances which under the ordinary conditions of temperature and pressure are liquids or solids. Vapors and the gases most easily liquefied deviate most widely from Boyle's law, that the volume is inversely proportional to the pressure, and also from the law of the constant increment of expansion with increase of temperature. Gases are distinguished from liquids by the name of elastic fluids, because of their power of indefinite expansion. (See liquid.) The number of gaseous bodies is great, and they differ greatly in their chemical properties. They are all, however, susceptible of combining chemically with fluid and solid substances. Some of them are of great importance in the arts and manufactures, as, for example, carbonic acid or carbon dioxide, sulphurous acid or sulphur dioxide, and coal gas. Gases are ordinarily invisible.

That such subterranean steams will easily mingle with liquids, and imbue them with their own qualities, may be inferred from the experiment of mixing the gas (as the Helmontians call it), or the scarce cognizable fumes of kindled and extinguished brimstone, with wine, which is thereby long preserved.

Bonds, Origin and Virtues of Gases, in Gases are distinguished from other forms of matter, not only by their power of indefinite expansion so as to fill any vessel, however large, and by the great effect which heat has in dilating them, but by the uniformity and simplicity of the laws which regulate their changes.

Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 31

Specifically—2. In coal-mining, any explosive mixture of fire-damp with common air.—3. In popular language, a compound of various gases, used for illuminating and heating purposes. It is some form of carbureted hydrogen artificially made and distributed by pipes to points of consumption. The common kind is coal-gas, obtained from bituminous coals by carbonization in retorts at a high temperature. A carbureted hydrogen gas, called water-gas, resulting from the passing of steam through a mass of incandescent carbon and the subsequent admixture of hydrocarbons or other enriching substances, is also used. Oil gas is an illuminating gas obtained by the distilling at high temperature of petroleum or other liquid hydrocarbons.

4. A gas-light: as, the gas is dim; turn down the gas. [Colloq.]—5. Empty or idle talk; frothy speech; rant. [Colloq.]

Th add that our people should have not water on the brain, but a little gas there.

Emerson.

Absorption of gases. See absorption. Diffusion of gases. See diffusion. Effusion of gases. See effusion.—Gas-liquor, liquor separated by condensers from crude coal-gas in the process of manufacture. It contains in solution a number of ammonium compounds which would diminish the illuminating power of the gas, and from which ammonium sulphate and chloride are manufactured.—Natural gas, combustible gas formed naturally in the earth. It is sometimes found issuing through crevices, but is generally obtained by boring. Natural gas has long been used in western China and elsewhere. It has been found in great abundance in western Pennsylvania and the adjoining region of New York, also to some extent in Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia, and Kansas. It was first utilized in New York in 1821 and began about 1874 to be of importance commercially, especially in the vicinity of Pittsburgh. The area over which natural gas and petroleum are obtained in quantity, and the conditions of their occurrence, are in most respects essentially the same, but the principal source of the gas in Ohio and Indiana is a formation lower down in the geological series than that furnishing it in Pennsylvania. In the former States the gas comes from the Trenton limestone, a group belonging to the Lower Silurian; in the latter, from the Devonian. The natural gas burned at Pittsburgh contains about 67 per cent. of marsh gas, 22 of hydrogen, 5 of an ethylene compound, 3 of nitrogen, together with a small percentage of carbonic acid, carbonic oxide, olefiant gas, and oxygen.—Rock-gas. Same as natural gas.

gas (gas), v. i.; pret. and pp. gassed, ppr. gassing. [gas, n.] 1. trans. To remove loose filaments from (net, lace, etc.) by passing the material between rollers and exposing it to the action of a large number of minute jets of gas.—2. To talk nonsense or falsehood (to); impose upon by wheedling, frothy, or empty speech. [Slang.]

Found that Fairplay had wanted to gas me, which he did pretty effectively. Sketches of Williams College, p. 72

But in all the rest, he is a gas.

Scribner's Mag., IV, 219.

II. intrans. To indulge in "gas" or empty talk; talk nonsense. [Slang.]

gasifier (gas-a-lér'), n. See gasifier.

gas-analyzer (gas'an-a-lí-zér'), n. An instrument for indicating the presence and quantity of the gases resulting from the destructive distillation of coal.

gas-bag (gas'bag), n. 1. A bag for holding gas, as for the use of dentists or for a limelight.—2. A cylindrical bag of some gas-tight material fitted with a tube and valve so that it can be filled with air from an air-pump. It is used to close a gas-main during repairs, by inserting it in the pipe when empty, and then blowing it up till it fills the pipe completely, and serves as a check or stop for the gas.

3. A boastful, loquacious person; a conceited gabbler. [Colloq. and vulgar.]

gas-battery (gas'bat'ér-i), n. A form of voltaic battery, invented by Grove, in which the cell consists of two glass tubes, in each of which is fused a platinum electrode covered with finely divided platinum and provided with binding-screws above. One of the tubes is partially filled with hydrogen and the other with oxygen, and both are inverted over dilute sulphuric acid. The platinum electrodes occlude part of the gases, and then play the part of the zinc and copper plates in an ordinary voltaic cell.

gas-black (gas'blak), n. A pigment obtained from burning gas. See black, n.

Give the wood a coat of size and lampblack, and then use gas-black in your polish rubber.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 261.

gas-bleaching (gas'blé'ching), n. The operation of bleaching by means of sulphur dioxide.

gas-boiler (gas'boí'ler), n. 1. A steam-boiler with which gas is used as fuel.—2. A small boiler for household use heated by gas.

gas-bracket (gas'brak'et), n. A pipe, frequently curved or jointed, projecting from the wall of a room, the body of a gasolier, etc., for the distribution of illuminating gas. The burner is fitted upon it.

gas-buoy (gas'boí'), n. A buoy having a large chamber filled with compressed gas and carrying a lamp. By the action of subsiding valves the gas can be made to burn in the lamp for many weeks, constituting a floating beacon.

gas-burner (gas'bér'nér), n. The tip or armature of a gas-burning lamp or bracket, through which the gas is caused to issue for consumption.

Gas burners are made in many shapes and types, but in all the object is to insure the complete exposure of the burning gas to a fresh supply of oxygen, and thus to obtain the greatest amount of light with the least expenditure of gas. The resulting flames assume the fancied forms of beaks, bats, wings, fish-tails, cock-spirals, etc., whence the different forms of burners have received distinctive names. The material used to tip of form the tips of the burners has also given names to them, as the lava tip burner. See burner. Argand gas-burner, a gas-burner made to produce a flame on the principle of that of the Argand lamp (which see, under lamp). Intensive gas-burner, a multiple gas burner formed by a number of bat-wing burners arranged circularly about the supply pipe. The flames meet and form a continuous sheet of flame.

gas-carbon (gas'kár'hon), n. Solid carbon formed in gas-retorts. See carbon. Also called in England gas-condens and gas-coke.

gas-check (gas'chek), n. A device for preventing the escape of gas through the vent or around the breech-mechanism which closes the rear end of the bore or chamber of any breech-loading small-arm, machine-gun, or cannon. In small arms the metallic cartridge case, copper or brass, serves as an effective gas check. (See cartridge, bullet, fermeture.) The Broadwell gas check consists of a curved steel or copper ring and a circular bearing plate slightly followed out. The curved ring is fitted into a counter bore or recess in the rear end of the bore or chamber, and is held firmly in position by the breech closing apparatus carrying the bearing plate. The ring is self-adjusting in its seat, and the bearing plate is easily adjusted. On firing, the gas expands the tip of the ring against the walls of the chamber, and this expansion prevents the escape of gas. The Krupp guns are furnished with this device.

gas-coal (gas'kól), n. Any coal suitable for making illuminating gas. See coal.

gas-company (gas'kum'pá-ní), n. A company formed to supply gas to a community for illuminating or other purposes, generally at a certain rate per 1,000 feet.

gas-compressor (gas'kóm-pres'gr), n. A pump used to compress coal-gas into portable reservoirs, as for railroad cars.

Gascon (gas'kon), n. [F. Gascon, < L. Vascon (n-), usually in pl. Vascones, an inhabitant of Vasconia, now Gascogne. (Cf. Basque.)] 1. A native of Gascony, a former province of southwestern France, now divided into several departments.—2. A boaster or braggart; a vainglorious person; from the reputation of the Gascons as a race for extreme boastfulness. See gasconade. Gascon wine, a name formerly given to wine brought into England from the south of France, especially red wine, nearly corresponding to the modern claret or Bordeaux.

gasconade (gas'kónád'), n. [F. gasconade, < Gascon, an inhabitant of Gascogne; see Gascon.] A boast or boasting; vaunt; bravado; vaunting or boastful talk.

His great volubility and inimitable manner of speaking, as well as the great courage he showed on those occasions, did sometimes betray him into that figure of speech which is commonly distinguished by the name of gasconade.

Tatler, No. 115.

These brilliant expeditions too often evaporated in a mere border fray, or in an empty gasconade under the walls of Granada.

Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, I, 2.

gasconade (gas'kónád'), v. i.; pret. and pp. gasconaded, ppr. gasconading. [< gasconade, n.] To boast; brag; vaunt; bluster.

Or let the reader represent to himself the miserable charlatanerie of a gasconading secretary affecting to place himself upon a level with Caesar, by detailing to three ambassadors at once.

De Quincey, Plato.

gasconader (gas'kónád'ér), n. A great boaster. gas-condenser (gas'kón-dén'sér), n. An apparatus through which coal gas for illuminating purposes is passed as it comes from the retorts, to free it from tar. The hot gas is made to traverse a series of convoluted pipes in a chamber filled with cold water, causing the precipitation of the tar, which can then be drawn off by suitable devices. The gas passes from the condenser to the washer.

gascoynest, n. pl. Same as galligaskins. Beau, and Fl.

gaschrom (gas'króm), n. [A bad spelling of euschrom.] See euschrom.

Even the savage Highlanders, in Cathness and Southland, can make more work, and better, with their gaschrom, or whatever they call it.

Scott, Pirate, II.

gas-drain (gas'dráni), n. In coal-mining, a head-drum driven in a coal-mine for the special purpose of carrying off fire damp from the goaf, or from any working. [Eng.]

gaseity (gas'éi-tí), n. [< gaseous + -ity.] The state of being gaseous.

gasifier (gas'í-ér'), n. [< gas + -ier, in barbarous imitation of chandelier.] A chandelier adapted for burning gas instead of candles. See chandelier. Also written gasolier.

As we both entered the drawing room, we found Bell standing right under the central gasifier.

W. Black, Phantom, III.

gas-engine (gas'en-jín'), n. A heat-engine in which a mixture of gas and air is successively compressed, ignited, expanded, and rejected, transforming heat of combustion into work. Illuminating, heating, and natural gas and the vapors of petroleum are the usual combustible elements. The engine is usually single acting, and its cylinder is covered with a water jacket to prevent injury by the incandescent charge. It is now built in large sizes and is very economical of fuel.

gas-engineer (gas'en-jín'ér'), n. In a theater, etc., one who directs the application and use of gas and other media of artificial illumination.

The gas-engineer, a functionary who in a modern theatrical establishment of the first rank must also be an electrician.

Scribner's Mag., IV, 440.

gaseous (gas'ē-us), a. [< gas + -ous; = Sp. gaseoso. Cf. It. gaseoso = F. gazeux.] 1. In the form of gas or an aëriiform fluid; of the nature of gas.

The appliance employed (in the principle of muscular motion), whether it be fluid, gaseous, elastic, electrical, or none of these, or nothing resembling these, is unknown to us.

Paley, Nat. Theol., vii.

Oxygen and nitrogen are examples of gases which are not known in any other than the gaseous condition.

Huxley, Physiologicaly, p. 47.

2. Figuratively, wanting substance or solidity; flimsy.

Unconnected, gaseous information. Sir J. Stephen.

gaseousness (gas'ē-us-nēs), n. The state or quality of being gaseous.

gas-field (gas'fēld), n. A region or area of territory from which natural gas is obtained in sufficient quantity to be of economical importance.

gas-fitter (gas'fīt'ēr), n. One whose business is the fitting up of buildings, etc., with all the requisites for the use of illuminating gas.

gas-fixture (gas'fiks'tūr), n. A permanent apparatus for the burning of illuminating gas, including a burner or set of burners and the tube connecting it with a gas-pipe, a key or keys for turning the flow of gas off or on, etc. See gas-bracket and gaseller.

gas-furnace (gas'fūr'nās), n. 1. A furnace heated by the combustion of gas.—2. A furnace for distilling gas from coal or some other form of carbon.

gas-gage (gas'gāj), n. An instrument for ascertaining the pressure of gas, generally consisting of a bent graduated tube containing water or mercury, open at one end and with the other screwed into the vessel containing the gas.

gas-globe (gas'glōb), n. A globe of glass or porcelain used to shade a gas-light.

gas-governor (gas'gūv'ēr-ngr), n. 1. An apparatus, controlled by gas-pressure, which regulates the speed of a steam-engine driving a gas-exhauster, thus maintaining any required pressure or exhaust.—2. A device for regulating the flow of illuminating gas from a burner and preventing waste.

Also called gas-regulator.

gas-gun (gas'gun), n. A pipe in which gases are exploded for signaling purposes.

gash¹ (gash), v. t. [A corruption of an older garsh, which, again, stands for orig. garse, < ME. garse, garce, garse; a gash, incision, scurification, < garson, garcen, gaurcyn, gash, scurify, < OF. garser, scurify (cf. later garscher, chap, as the hands or lips; cf. ML. garsa, scurification); perhaps ult. < (ir. garasair, furrow, scratch: see character.)] To make a long deep incision in the flesh; cut deeply into the flesh of: as, to gash a person's cheek.

*Gashed with honourable scars,
Low in glory a lap they lay.*

Montgomery, Battle of Alexandria.

gash² (gash), n. [Earlier garsh, garse, < ME. garse, garce, garse; from the verb.] An incision or cut, relatively long and deep; particularly, a cut in flesh; a slash.

Touche and handle ye my side, I bath the gashes of the spear.

Ought we, like madmen, to tear off the plaisters that the gentle hand of prudence had spread over the wounds and gashes which in our delirium of ambition we had given to our own body?

Ridley, Speech at Bristol, 1780.

The dell, upon the mountain's crest

Yawned like a gash on war for a breast

Scott, L. of the L., iii. 38

gash³ (gash), n. [See, supposed to be an abbreviation of F. sagace, < L. sagax, sagacious; see sagacious.] 1. Shrewd; sagacious; having the appearance of sagacity joined with that of self-importance.

He was a gash and faithfu' tyke

As ever lap a shough or dyke.

Burns, The Two Dogs

2. Lively and fluent in discourse; talkative.

Good claret heat keeps out the cold,

And drives away the winter soon;

It makes a man both gash and bauld.

And heaves his soul beyond the moon.

Ramsay, Poems, II. 30

3. Trim; well dressed.

Here farmers gash, in ridin' graith,

Good hoddin' by their cottars.

Burns, Holy Fair.

[Scotch in all uses.]

gash⁴ (gash), v. t. [< gash², a., 2.] To converse; gossip; tattle; gush. [Scotch.]

She lees them gashin' at their cracks,

An' slips out by herself.

Burns, Halloween.

gas-heater (gas'hē'tēr), n. 1. A group of gas-burners arranged in an open fireplace or in an inclosed stove, for warming a room by the direct or reflected heat of gas-jets.—2. A small portable gas-stove for heating tools, melting solders, etc.

gashful (gash'fūl), a. [A corruption of gashful, gashful, appar. by vague association with gash¹. Cf. gashly for gashly, gashly. The opposite change appears in wishful for wishful.] (Gashly; frightful; deathlike. [Prov. Eng.]

gashliness (gash'li-nēs), n. [< gashly + -ness.] The condition or quality of being gashly or gashly; dreadfulness; deadliness. [Prov. Eng.]

The general dulness (gashliness was Mrs. Wickam's strong expression) of her present life.

Lockens, Dombey and Son, viii.

gashly (gash'li), a. [A corruption of gashly, gashly, appar. by vague association with gash¹. Cf. gashful.] Gashly; horrible; dreadful; deadly. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Their warm and wapon embraces of living bodies ill agreed with their offerings this manibus, to gashly ghosts

Fuller, Paschal Night, IV. vii. 27.

By all that is hirute and gashly

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, v. 215.

gas-holder (gas'hōl'dēr), n. A vessel for the storage of gas after purification, and for regulating its flow through street-mains, burners, etc. See out under gasometer.

gash-vein (gash'vān), n. In mining, a fissure containing veinstone or ore, or both intermixed, which does not extend downward or upward into another formation or group of strata. A gash appears usually to be the result of a shrinkage, or of some slight tension of the rock in which it occurs. Pressure, as used in the term gash-vein, means a crack which has a deep-seated cause, and which therefore may be expected to extend downward or upward, regardless of any change in the formation. (See pressure vein.) The lead-bearing crevices of the upper Mississippi lead region are gash veins. They do not pass out of the calciferous dolomite into the underlying blue limestone, or into the overlying shales of the Hudson River group.

gasification (gas'ē-d-kā'shon), n. [As gasify + -ation. Cf. F. gasification.] The act or process of converting a substance into gas, or producing gas from it.

gasiform (gas'ē-fōrm), a. [< gas + L. forma, form. Cf. F. gasiforme.] Gaseous; aëriiform.

gasify (gas'ē-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. gasified, ppr. gasifying. [Also written gasefy; < gas + -ify. Cf. F. gaséfier.] To produce gas or an aëriiform fluid from, or convert into gas, as by the application of heat, or other chemical process.

All that has lived must die, and all that is dead must be disintegrated, dissolved, or gashed gas-indicator (gas'in'di-kā-tōr), n. An instrument for indicating the pressure of gas in a pipe, or the presence of fire-damp in a mine.

Life of Pasteur, tr. by Lady Claud Hamilton, p. 61.

gas-jet (gas'jet), n. 1. A spout of flame issuing from a gas-burner.—2. A gas-burner.

gasket (gas'ket), n. [Appar. corrupted from F. gascette, a gasket, a cat-o'-nine tails, < Sp. garceta, a gasket, hair which falls in locks on the temples; origin unknown. The It. gascetta, a gasket, appears to be from F.] 1. Naut., one of several bands of senit or canvas, or small lines, used to bind the sails to the yards, gaffs, or masts when furled. Also called casket.

Here, too, we had our southwester tacks aboard again, - slip ropes, buoy ropes, . . . and rope yarns for gaskets

R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 25.

I noticed a man clamber out on the jibboom to snag the jib, that showed disposition to blow clear of its gaskets

W. C. Russell, Sailor's Sweetheart, 2.

2. In mach., a strip of leather, tow, plaited hemp, or similar material, used for packing a piston, as of the steam-engine and its pumps, - bunt gasket. See bunt gasket. Quarter gasket, a gasket placed about half-way out on the vird.

gasking (gas'king), n. [Cf. gasket, 2.] Packing, usually of hemp.

The flanon on which this cover rests is grooved a little to admit of "gasking" being inserted. Civ. Dict., 1 372 gaskins (gas'kinz), n. pl. [Also gascogues, abbr. of gailgaskins, gailgascogues, etc.] Same as gailgaskins, 1.

If one break, the other will hold; or, if both break, your gaskins fall.

Shaks., T. N., I. 3.

gas-lamp (gas'lāmp), n. A lamp containing one or more fixtures supplied with gas-burners for giving light in a building or street.

gas-light (gas'lit), n. Light, or a provision for light, produced by the combustion of coal-gas; a gas-jet, or the light from it.

The gas-light wavers dimmer.

Tennyson, Will Waterpoor.

gas-lighted (gas'hē'ted), a. Lighted by means of illuminating gas: as, a gas-lighted hall.

gas-lighting (gas'hē'ting), n. Illumination by means of gas.

gas-lime (gas'lim), n. Lime that has been used as a filter for the purification of illuminating gas.

The bluish-green mass which is produced in the purification of illuminating gas . . . is generally known by the name of "refuse gas-lime." C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 273.

gas-liquor (gas'lik'ēr), n. A liquid containing ammonia and ammonium carbonate and sulphid, besides other products, obtained from coal in the manufacture of illuminating gas.

gas-log (gas'log), n. A device resembling a piece (or several pieces) of fire-wood, used in a fireplace in which gas is burned.

gas-machine (gas'mā-shēn'), n. An apparatus for carbureting air in making illuminating gas in small quantities; a carbureter.

gas-main (gas'mān), n. One of the principal underground pipes which convey gas from the gas-works to the places where it is to be consumed.

gas-man (gas'mān), n. 1. A man employed in the manufacture or concerned with the supplying of illuminating gas.—2. In coal-mining, an employee who examines the underground workings for the purpose of ascertaining whether fire-damp is present in dangerous quantity, and who also has supervision of the ventilation.—3. Theat., the person who controls the lights on the stage.

gas-meter (gas'mē'tēr), n. An apparatus through which illuminating gas is made to pass, in order to ascertain the number of cubic feet of it produced at gas-works or consumed by those supplied with it. Of this apparatus there are two types, the wet and the dry, the former being now principally used for measuring the quantity produced, and the latter, on a much smaller scale, the quantity consumed. The wet meter is composed of an outer box about three fifths filled with water. Within this is a revolving four-chambered drum, each chamber being capable of containing a definite quantity of gas, which is admitted through a pipe in the center of the meter, and, owing to the arrangement of the partitions of the chambers, causes the drum to maintain a constant revolution. This sets in motion a train of wheels carrying the hands over the dials which mark the quantity of gas passing. The dry meter consists of two or three chambers, each divided by a flexible partition or diaphragm, by the motion of which the capacity on one side is diminished, while that on the other is increased. By means of slide valves, like those of a steam-engine, worked by the movement of the diaphragms, the gas to be measured passes alternately in and out of each space. The contractions and expansions set in motion the clockwork which marks the rate of consumption. The diaphragms in all the chambers are so connected that they move in concert.

gas-motor (gas'mō'tōr), n. Same as gas-engine.

Gas motors, which are employed in a certain measure, have rendered electric lighting economical.

Hopfather, Electricity (trans.), p. 264.

gasogene (gas'ō-jēn), n. Same as gazogene.

gasolene, gasoline (gas'ō-lēn, -līn), n. [< gas + -ol + -ene, -ane.] The lightest volatile liquid product commonly obtained from the distillation of petroleum. Its specific gravity is .689 to .6973 (68° to 80° F.). It is used in vapor-stoves, and for saturating air or gas in gas-machines or carbureters.

gasolier (gas'ō-lēr), n. A chandelier in which gas is used. [Trade use.]

gasometer (gas-om'ē-tēr), n. [= F. gasomètre = Sp. gasómetro = Pg. gasómetro = It. gasometro = D. G. Dan. Sw. gasometer; as gas + Gr. uetpor, a measure.] 1. In chem.: (a) An instrument or apparatus intended to measure, collect, preserve, or mix different gases. (b) An instrument for measuring the quantity of gas employed in any chemical experiment.—2. A reservoir or storehouse for gas, especially for the ordinary illuminating gas produced in gas-works, which supplies the various pipes employed in lighting streets and houses. The main part of the structure is a cylindrical gas-holder, formed of riveted sheet-iron plates braced internally, closed at the upper end, and resting in the open lower end in a temporary or brickwork water-tank of corresponding form, in which it rises or falls according to the amount of gas passing into or out of it. The holder (often more than 100 feet in diameter, and sometimes made in telescoping sections) is suspended from a heavy framework by chains passing over pulleys and terminating in partially counterbalancing weights, which aid in regulating the pressure. The name gas-holder is often used for the whole structure, as more appropriate than gasometer, since it is not in any sense a meter.

gasometric (gas-ô-met'rik), a. [As gasometer + -ic.] Of or pertaining to gasometry or the measurement of gases. — Gasometric analysis, in chem., the process of separating and estimating the relative proportions of the constituents of a gaseous body. This is effected either by the action of absorbents, as on gas contained in a eudiometer, or by exploding the gas with oxygen and observing the volumes before and after explosion.

gasometry (gas-om'e-tri), n. [= F. gazométrie = Sp. gaseometría = It. gaseometria; as gasometer + -y.] The science, art, or practice of measuring gases.

gascoscope (gas-ô-skôp), n. [gas + (Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.)] An instrument for indicating the presence of gas in buildings, mines, etc.

gas-oven (gas-uv'n), n. An oven heated by jets of burning gas.

gasp (gasp), v. [ME. gaspen, gayspen, < Ice. gelspa = Sw. gäspa, dial. gäspa, yawn, = Dan. gäpe, gasp. Cf. Lat. jaspere, yawn, which suggests that gasp stands for gaps* (cf. clasp, ME. clapsen, hisp, dial. haps, etc.), a deriv. of gape; but this does not suit the Scand. forms; Ice. gäpa could not produce gäspa.] I. intrans. 1. To labor for breath with open mouth; respire convulsively; pant with great effort.

For thee I longed to die, for thee I now welcome death,
And welcome be that happy pang, that stops my gasping breath.
Gasconade, Flowers, In Trust to Freedom.

These rugged names to our like mouths grow sleek,
That would have made Quintilian stare and gasp.
Milton, Sonnets, vi.

2. To desire with eagerness; crave vehemently.

Quenching the gasping furrowed thirst with rayne.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., April.

E'en so my gasping soul, dissolved in tears,
Doth search for thee, my God!
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 11.

To gasp for or after, to pant, strain, or long for: as to gasp for breath; to gasp for or after freedom.

The Castilian and his wife had the comfort to be under the same master, who, seeing how dearly they loved one another, and gaped after liberty, demanded a most exorbitant price for their ransom.
Spectator, No. 108.

II. trans. To emit or utter gaspingly: with away, forth, out, etc.

And long was it not ere they gasped up the gale.
Str. T. More, Comfort against Tribulation (1573), fol. 42.

She could not see even her children's faces, though we heard her gasping out their names.
Dickens.

gasp (gasp), n. [= Ice. gæsp = Dan. gæsp; from the verb.] The act of catching the breath with open mouth; labored respiration; a short, convulsive catching of the breath.

Gasped shortly gase
A quiet gase or twaine,
And being dead, his noble sonne
Succeeded him in rage.
Warner, Albion's England, iv. 22.

Let all be hushed, each softest motion cease,
Be every loud tumultuous thought at peace,
And every end or gasp of breath
Be calm, as in the arms of death.
Courtesy, On Mrs. A. Hunt, Singing.

Then Balin told him brokenly and in gasps
All that had chanced.
Tennyson, Balin and Balan.

The last gasp, the final expiration in death; hence, the utmost extremity, the expiring effort.

To the last gasp I deny thee
Platner (and another), Elder Brother, v. 1.

The rebellion seemed more at its last gasp, the Duke is marched, and the rebels fly before him, in the utmost want of money.
Walsley, Letters, II. 15.

gasparillo (gas-pa-ril'ô), n. [W. Ind.] 1. In Trinidad, the wood of a species of Licania, a rosaceous genus resembling Chrysobalanus. — 2. In Jamaica, a species of Esenbeckia, a rutaceous genus, the bark of which has tonic properties.

gasping (gas'ping), n. [Verbal n. of gasp, v.] A convulsive effort of breathing.

Wounds, shrieks, and gasps are his proud delight,
And he by hellishness his prowess scorns.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, xi. 7.

gasping (gas'ping), p. a. Convulsive; spasmodic, as violent breathing.

Strove to speak, but naught but gasping sighs
His lips could utter.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 421.

They found him lying on the floor, . . . extremities cyanotic and cold, and respiration gasping.
Medical News, LII. 321.

gaspingly (gas'ping-li), adv. In a gasping manner; with gasps.

gas-pipe (gas'pîp), n. A pipe for the conveyance of gas.

gas-plant (gas'plant), n. 1. A name of the fraxinella, Dicranus Fraxinella: so called from its exhalation of an inflammable vapor. — 2. An establishment or "plant" for the manufacture and supply of gas; a gas-works with all the necessary adjuncts, as street-lamps, offices, etc.

gas-plate (gas'plât), n. A slightly hollowed hardened steel disk set in the face of the sliding-block of the Krupp breech-mechanism to receive the direct force of the powder-gases.

gas-plot (gas'plot), n. In theaters, a diagram prepared by the gas-engineer for each act in a play, upon which is plotted a plan of the scene, with the positions of all pockets and lights, the names of the men stationed at them, and a memorandum of the duties and cues of each.

gas-pore (gas'pôr), n. A cavity in a mineral containing gas-bubbles. Serphy. See inclusion.

gas-port (gas'pôrt), n. A port used in the management of gas, as "plugs" and hydrants are used for water.

Around natural gas-ports grass has been green all winter as in summer.

New York Semi-weekly Tribune, March 11, 1887.

gas-purifier (gas'pû ri-fi-er), n. In gas-making, an apparatus for freeing the gas from sulphur compounds, and through which the gas is caused to flow as it comes from the gas washer or scrubber. One form is the wet-line purifier, in which the gas traverses a number of chambers partially filled with a creamy mixture of lime and water, through which it bubbles. In the dry-line purifier, moistened hydrate of lime is placed on iron trays, through which the gas is filtered. In other purifiers hydrated soapstone of iron and other materials are substituted for the lime. After the action of the purifier, the gas is ready for use.

gas-range (gas'rang), n. A cooking-stove or range in which gas is used as fuel.

gas-register (gas'rej'is-ter), n. An apparatus for recording the pressure of gas. It is a cylinder covered with paper, and made to revolve by clockwork. Time is indicated by vertical graduations on the paper, while the pressure of the gas in the mains controls a pencil, the point of which rests against the cylinder, and records in a rising and falling line the changes in pressure.

gas-regulator (gas'reg'g-in-ter), n. Same as gas-governor.

gas-retort (gas're-tôrt'), n. A chamber in which carbonaceous matter is distilled to produce illuminating gas.

gas-ring (gas'ring), n. In the forms of breech-loading firearms, a gas-check consisting of a thin steel or copper plate perforated to the exact size of the caliber of the gun, and serving as a face-plate to the breech block. The chamber of the breech block is larger than the hole in the plate, so that when a charge explodes in the gun the gas from the explosion flows back into the chamber, forcing the plate or ring forward against the breech of the gun.

gas sand (gas'sand), n. Sandstone yielding natural gas. The various beds of sandstone in the gas and petroleum regions of Pennsylvania are frequently called sands.

The Sheffield gas sand, the lowest in Western Co., is of Chemung age.
Amer. Jour. Sci., (3rd ser.), LXVI. 269.

Gasserian (ga-sê'ri-an), n. Of or pertaining to the German physician Gasserius (1565-77); as, the Gasserian ganglion, often mistakenly called the Cassarian. See ganglion.

gassing (gas'ing), n. [Verbal n. of gas, v.] 1. The process of singeing lace, cotton, yarn, etc., to remove the hairy filaments.

The gassing or singeing, in which the hairy yarn is run continually through a gas flame at a speed carefully regulated so that the flame shall burn off the loose filaments.
Harper's Mag., LXVI. 269.

2. The act or practice of talking in an idle, empty manner; talking nonsense. [Slang.]

gassing-frame (gas'ing-frâm), n. An apparatus in which yarns are run off from one bobbin to another and carried through gas flames in the operation of gassing. A stop-motion is used to draw the yarn out of the flame in a neat knot and stops and thus prevent it from burning.

Gassiot's cascade (gas'siôt's kas-kad'), n. An electrical discharge having the appearance of a cascade passing over the surface of a cup or beaker placed within the receiver of an air-pump.

gassoul (ga-sôl'), n. [Morocco.] A mineral soap exported in considerable quantities from Morocco.

gas-stove (gas'stôv), n. An apparatus for utilizing coal-gas, water-gas, or the vapor of gasoline in heating and cooking, by means of small jets. Large gas-stoves are sometimes called gas-ranges.

gassy (gas'i), a. [gas + -y.] 1. Pertaining to, characteristic of, or containing gas; gaseous.

A kind of fuel that does not burn with a bright gassy flame.
Huxley, Physiological, p. 244.

2. Given to "gas" or "gassing"; prone to conceited, boastful, or high-flown talk; as, a gassy fellow. [Slang.]

Gassy politicians in Congress. A. A. Rev., CXLIII. 220.

gast (gast), n. A Middle English form of ghost.

gast (gast), v. t. [ME. gasten (pret. gaste, pp. gastid, gast), frighten, make afraid, also in comp. agasten (pret. agaste, pp. agasted, usually agast, > mod. E. agast, misspelled agast), < AS. gæstan, frighten, found only once in pret. pl. gæston ("His gæston Godes compen garð and ligð," they afflicted God's champions with spear and flame ("with fire and sword") — Juliana, 17) = G. dial. (Hav.) gæsten, afflict, make afraid; prob. not connected, as is commonly understood, with AS. gast, E. ghost (as if "terrify by a ghostly apparition"), but rather formed, with deriv. -t, from thor-root (√ gaste) of Goth. us-gastejan, make afraid, us-gastejan, be amazed, prob. akin to L. haurere, stick fast, adhere, the connecting notion appearing in the expressions "to root to the spot with terror," "to transfuse with terror," "to stand transfixed with astonishment," etc. Hence gaster, and gastly, now usually spelled ghastly: see ghastly, agast, etc.] To terrify; frighten; strike agast.

Bothe Treuthe schal Euchen ewe
Bothe to sowen and to setten and sauen his tilthe, Gaste crownen from his corn.
Piers Plowman (A), vii. 124.

Confoundd ben the wise men, part ("perterriti," Vulg.) and east the ben ("they are dismayed and taken," A. V.) Wyclf. Jer. viii. 8.

Or whether gasted by the noise I made,
Full suddenly he fled.
Shak., Lear (ed. Furness), II. 1.

I made thee flee, and quickly leave thy hold,
Thou never wast in all thy life an ghost.
Mir. for Mags., p. 120.

gas-table (gas'ta-bl), n. In a theater, a table and an upright slab near the proscenium on the prompt side of the stage, upon which are a number of valves and switches whereby the gas-engineer controls all the lights in the house.

gastaldite (gas-tal'dit), n. [Named after Prof. B. Gastaldt.] A variety of glaucophane.

gas-tank (gas'tangk), n. A gas holder; a gasometer.

gas-tar (gas'tär), n. Same as coal-tar.

gaster (gas'tär), v. t. [Freq. of gast.] To frighten; scare. [Prov. Eng.]

If the fellow be not out of his wits, then will I never have any more with while I live. Either the sight of the lady has gasterd him, or else he is drunk, or else he walks in his sleep. Beau. and Fl., With several Weapons, II. 2.

gaster (gas'tär), n. [NL., < L. gaster (gaster, gaster), < Gr. γαστήρ (gen. gastros, synepetated gastros, in comp. gastros, rarely gastrop), the belly, stomach, maw, the womb; doubtfully identified with Rkt. jathara, the belly, womb, and with L. venter, the belly, womb; see venter.] The stomach; the belly or abdomen; rarely used alone, but entering into many compounds and derivatives referring to the stomach, abdomen, or abdominal organs, or a part likened thereto.

gasteric (gas'ter'ik), a. Same as gastric. Thom., Med. Diet.

gastero-. Same as gastro-, combining form of gaster.

Gasterocoma (gas'te-rok'ô-mâ), n. [NL. (Goldfuss, 1829), < Gr. γαστήρ, stomach, + κομή, hair.] The typical genus of the family Gasterocomidae.

Gasterocomide (gas'te-ro-kom'i-dâ), n. pl. [NL., < Gasterocoma + -ida.] A family of encrinetes or fossil erinoids, found in the Devonian rocks.

Gasterolichenes (gas'te-ro-lih-ke-nôz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γαστήρ, stomach, + λίχην, lichen.] A small group of plants having algal gonidia and fungal hyphae which form a peridium, and produce spores in the same manner as the Gasteromycetes, especially of Lycoperdon. Two genera and three species are known.

Gasteromycetes (gas'te-rô-mi-sê-tês), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γαστήρ, stomach, + μύκης, pl. mykes, mushroom.] In mycology, one of the principal divisions of the Basidiomycetes, characterized by having the hymenium inclosed, lining small cavities, which are formed within a peridium. The principal genera are Gaster (earth-star) and Lycoperdon (puffball). Some species of the latter attain a large size. See out under peridium.

gasteromycetous (gas'te-rō-mi-sē'tus), a. Belonging to or having the characters of Gasteromycetes.

Gasteropegmata (gas'te-rō-pēg'ma-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + pegma, a thing fastened, a frame; see pegma.] A division or suborder of lyopontaneous brachiopods, characterized by the attachment to foreign substances of the ventral valve, proposed for the family Crinoidae.

Gastrophilus, Gastrophilus (gas'te-rō-fī-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + philos, loving.] A leading genus of dipterous insects, of the family Catantopidae, or bot-flies, several species of which infest the horse and ass. G. equi is the common bot fly of the horse, which lays its eggs on the skin, whence they are transferred to the stomach by the animal in licking itself, there to hatch into the larvae or grubs known as bots, which are passed per anum and become mature flies in dung or earth. Also Gastrophilus see cut under bot fly.

gastropod, gastropod (gas'te-rō-pōd, gas'trō-pōd), n. and a. [NL., gaster, stomach, pod, foot; see gasteropodous.] I. n. A gastropodous mollusk; any one of the Gastropoda.

II. a. Gastropodous.

Also gasteropodan, gasteropodan.

[The form gastropod is more commonly used.] Gasteropoda, Gastropoda (gas'te-rō-pō-dā, gas'trō-pō-dā), n. pl. [NL., (Cuvier, 1798), neut. pl. of gasteropod, gasteropod (-pod-); see gasteropodous.] A group of mollusks to which different values and limits have been assigned. (a) Originally it was considered by some as a section and by others as an order of the mollusks, which were then ranked as a class. Later it was raised to a class and almost universally accepted as such. (1) It has generally been customary to include in it all the mollusks with a distinct head and foot developed from the abdominal surface, thus contrasted with the classes Cephalopoda and Pteropoda. (2) By many it has been extended to include all having a head, thus embracing the Pteropoda and excluding only the Cephalopoda. (3) By others it has been restricted to those having a distinct head, abdominal foot, and a spiral, subapical, or low oval or conic shell or naked body, thus excluding the Scaphopoda. (4) By others still it has been further confined to those having a spiral or subapical shell or naked body, and a more or less asymmetrical arrangement of the internal organs, the Chitona and some naked related types being consequently eliminated. Within even the narrowest limits assigned to it, the class is very diversified. Generally a univalve shell is developed, but in many forms of several orders or suborders the shell is obsolete or entirely absent in the adult. Even in the naked forms, however, the embryo or larva is generally provided with a shell. The shell is usually spiral, or rather of an elongated conic form wound round in a spiral coil, but varying from a very high turritid form to a discoid or even sunken spine, an intermediate stage being the most common, in various types. It is of a broad conic or patelliform shape, and in others, especially the terrestrial slugs, it is reduced to a scale-like element concealed under the mantle. The shape of the shell generally agrees with the structure of the soft parts, but sometimes differs so much that a gastropod can only be properly classified by examination of the anatomy of the animal. In most marine species, as well as in many terrestrial ones, an operculum more or less closing the aperture of the shell is developed from the foot of the animal, but in most of the land shells (Pulmonata) it is wanting. One of the distinguishing characteristics of Gastropoda, giving name to the class, is the foot, which is generally broad, muscular, and disk-like, and attached to the ventral surface, but in some it is obsolete and in others, as the Heteropoda, compressed and adapted for swimming. The garden-slug may be regarded as a typical gastropod. The class comprises also whelks, periwinkles, limpets, cowries, and many other univalve or shell-less forms. No known gastropod has a bivalve shell. Cochleata is a synonym.

(b) In Lamarck's system of classification (1801) it is a suborder or order of Cephalopoda (Gasteropoda of Cuvier), containing those gastropods in which the shell is reduced or wanting, thus including the nudibranchs, limpetiform pulmonates, and similar forms collectively contrasted with Trachylapoda.

gasteropodan, gasteropodan (gas'te-rō-pō-dā, gas'trō-pō-dā), a. and n. Same as gasteropod.

Gasteropodophora (gas'te-rō-pō-dō-fō-rā), n. pl. [NL., (Gray, 1821), < Gr. gaster, stomach, + phora (phōr), foot, + phora = E. bear.] A class of mollusks, the same as Gastropoda without the Heteropoda.

gasteropodous, gasteropodous (gas'te-rō-pō-dus, gas'trō-pō-dus), a. [NL., gaster, stomach, pod, foot; see gasteropodous.] (1) Crawling on the belly; using the under surface of the body, technically called the pedium or foot, as an organ of locomotion on which to creep along, as a snail, slug, or other univalve mollusk; specifically applied to the Gastropoda. The word is also applied in a very narrow sense to certain gastropods, as the Limacidae or slugs, in distinction from Trachylapoda (and of the Hydrobia, etc.). [The form gasteropodous is more commonly used.]

gasteropterid, gasteropterid (gas'te-rōp'te-rīd, gas'trōp'te-rīd), n. A gastropod of the family Gasteropteridae.

Gasteropteridae, Gasteropteridae (gas'te-rōp'te-rīd, gas'trōp'te-rīd), n. pl. [NL., (Swainson, 1840), < Gasteropteron + -idae.] A family of tectibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Gasteropteron. The animal has very wide expanded epipodia or lateral swimming lobes, a cephalic disk without tentacles, and the radula without central teeth, but with large pectinated lateral teeth and numerous aculeate marginal ones. The shell is internal, small, and nautiliform or patulous. Between 20 and 30 species are known.

Gasteropteron, Gasteropteron (gas'te-rōp'te-rōn, gas'trōp'te-rōn), n. [NL., (Meckel, 1813), < Gr. gaster, stomach, + pteron, wing.] A notable genus of tectibranchiate gastropods, typical of the family Gasteropteridae. The visceral ganglia are in three pairs, right and left, and the esophageal ring has a pair of cerebral and a pair of pedal ganglia, with six visceral ganglia. The form was at first supposed to be a pteropod.

Gasteropterophora (gas'te-rōp'te-rōfō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + pteron, wing, + phora (phōr) = E. bear.] In J. E. Gray's classification (1821), the third class of mollusks, corresponding to the order Heteropoda of Lamarck, or Nudibranchiata of De Blainville; the heteropods: regarded by others as an order of gastropods.

Gasteropterygi, Gasteropterygi (gas'te-rōp'te-rījī, gas'trōp'te-rījī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + pteryx (ptērīx), wing.] In Ichth., an order of fishes, the same as Multopterygi abdominales. Goldfuss, 1820.

gasterosteid (gas'te-rōs'te-īd), n. A fish of the family Gasterosteidae, a stickleback.

Gasterosteidae (gas'te-rōs'te-īdē), n. pl. [NL., < Gasterosteus + -idae.] A family of hemibranchiate fishes, with a more or less fusiform body, conic or moderately produced snout, sides naked or with a row of bony shields, and the ventral fins subthoracic and composed of a large spine and one ray. About 20 species are known, which all share collectively the name stickleback, but exhibit differences inducing naturalists to divide them into from 2 to 6 genera, the best known of which are Gasterosteus, including the largest fresh water 2-spined species, Pygosteus, containing the many spined species, with 4 to 10 spines, and Spinachia, represented by a marine species, the longest and largest of the family, with 13 spines, known as the sea-stickleback, etc. See stickleback.

gasterosteiform (gas'te-rōs'te-ī-fōrm), a. [See Gasterosteiformes.] Having the characters of the Gasterosteidae; pertaining to the Gasterosteiformes.

Gasterosteiformes (gas'te-rōs'te-ī-fōrmēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gasterosteus + L. forma, shape.] In Günther's system of classification, the twelfth division of Acanthopterygii, having the spinous dorsal fin, if present, composed of separate spines, and the ventral fins subabdominal in consequence of the prolongation of the pelvic bones, which are attached to the humeral arch.

Gasterosteus (gas'te-rōs'te-ī-us), n. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + osteus, a bone.] The typical genus of the family Gasterosteidae, containing the 2-spined and 6- to 10-spined sticklebacks, with rounded snout, and the pelvic bones forming a triangular area between the ventral fins. By some it is extended to include all the species of the family Gasterosteidae.

gasterosteoid (gas'te-rōs'te-ī-ōid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Gasterosteidae or Gasterosteidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Gasterosteidae; a gasterosteid or stickleback.

Gasterosteidae (gas'te-rōs'te-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gasterosteus + -idae.] A superfamily of hemibranchiate fishes, composed of the Gasterosteidae and the Aulorhynchidae.

Gasterosteus (gas'te-rōs'te-ī-us), n. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + osteus, a bone.] The typical genus of the family Gasterosteidae, by some extended to include all the species of that family, but by others restricted to the short species with pelvic bones forming a triangular plate, and two dorsal spines, as G. aculeatus; so called from the extension of the pelvic bones along the ventral aspect of the fish, making the belly bony. See stickleback.

gasterotheca (gas'te-rō-thē-kā), n.; pl. gasterothecae (gas'te-rō-thē-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. gaster, stomach, + theca, case; see theca.] In Entom., the abdomen-case, or that part of the integument of a pupa which covers the abdomen.

gasterothecal (gas'te-rō-thē-kāl), a. [As gasterotheca + -al.] Sheathing or casing the abdomen, as the integument of a pupa.

Gasterotricha (gas'te-rōt'rī-kā), n. p. name as Gasterotricha.

Gasterozoa, Gasterozoa (gas'te-rō, gas'trō-zō), n. pl. [NL., (Ficinus and Carus, 1838), < Gr. gaster, stomach, + zōon, animal.] A class of animals: same as Mollusca. [Not used.]

gasterozoid, gasterozoid (gas'te-rō, gas'trō-zō-īd), n. [< Gr. gaster, stomach, + zōon, q. v.] An alimentary or nutritive zoid of a polyp, as a hydrocoralline, having a mouth and a gastric cavity. H. N. Moseley, 1881.

gastful, gastfulness. See ghastful, ghastfulness.

gas-tight (gas'tīt), a. Sufficiently tight to prevent the escape of gas: frequently applied to stoppers or other appliances for closing bottles, etc.

None but a perfectly gas-tight cartridge would answer with this (Snider) action. W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 116.

gastly, gastness. The earlier and more proper spellings of ghastly and ghastness.

Gastornis (gas'tōr'nīs), n. [NL., < Gast (on), the Christian name of M. Planté, the discoverer, + Gr. ornis, a bird.] A genus of gigantic Eocene birds found in the conglomerate below the plastic clay of the Paris basin. G. parisensis was about as large as an ostrich, and is believed to have been a rattle or struthion bird, though referred to the Anatidae by A. Millie-Edwards. The Diapryna gigas of Cope, from the Eocene of New Mexico, is referred to the genus Gastornis by Comas. G. minor and G. edwardsi are other species recently discovered at Ichnos in France. The additional material shows a remarkable character in the permanence of the cranial sutures, usually obliterated in adult birds.

Gastornithes (gas'tōr-nī-thēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Gastornis, q. v.] A supposed order of birds, established for the reception of the fossil genus Gastornis.

gastorrhea, gastorrhea (gas'to-rē-ā), n. Contracted form of gastrotheca, gastrotheca.

Gastracantha (gas'tra-kan'thā), n. [NL., (Latreille, 1833), as Gastracantha, < Gr. gaster (gastēr), stomach, + kanthē, spine.] A genus of orbicularian spiders, giving name to a family Gastracanthidae, so called from the enormous horns into which the sides of the abdomen are prolonged. Often merged in Epeiridae. See Aeroma.

gastracanthid (gas'tra-kan'thīd), n. A spider of the family Gastracanthidae.

Gastracanthidae (gas'tra-kan'thī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gastracantha + -idae.] A family of orbicularian spiders, named from the genus Gastracantha.

gastraea (gas'trē-ā), n.; pl. gastraea (-ē). [NL., < Gr. gaster (gastēr), stomach.] In biol., a hypothetical animal form assumed by Haeckel as the ancestor of all metazoic animals—that is, of those which pass through or attain to the morphological form of a gastrula. See gastrula. It is a supposed primary intestinal animal of the form-value of a gastrula (palaeogenetic archigastrea) or germ-cup, consisting of two germ layers or blastodermic membranes, ectoderm and endoderm, the latter including a visceral cavity or enteron, and being itself enclosed in the ectoderm and having a protostoma or primitive blastopore communication with the exterior. In its simplest expression, a gastraea or gastrula represents a hollow sphere, or rather an hour-glass figure, with one half of it pushed into the other half, so that it makes a two-layered cup with a contracted opening. See embryo.

The gastrula at the present day presents a correct picture of the primitive gastraea, which must have developed from the Protozoa in the Laurentian period.

Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 248.

gastræd, gastræd (gas'trē-ad), n. [< NL. Gastrædes.] In biol., an animal which does not rise in development beyond the form of a gastrula, and which consequently has the form-value of the hypothetical gastraea. Haeckel.

Gastrædæ (gas'trē-a-dē), n. pl. [NL., < gastræa + -adæ.] A hypothetical group of primitive intestinal animals having the form of a gastrula, supposed by Haeckel to have arisen in the primordial geologic period in the direct line of descent of the remote ancestors of the human race. See gastræa.

Gastræades (gas'trē-a-dēz), n. pl. [NL.; cf. Gastræada.] In Gegenbaur's classification, a primary group of Spongia, consisting of the genera Haliphysema and Gastrophysema, which represent permanent gastrula stages through which other sponges pass. See cut under Haliphysema.

gastræa-form (gas'trē-a-fōrm), n. A gastræd; a gastrula, or an animal resembling one. Gegenbaur (trans.).

gastræum (gas'trē-um), n. [NL., < Gr. gaster (gastēr), stomach. Cf. gastræa.] In ornith., the whole ventral surface or under side of a bird; the sternum and uræum together: op-

A Gastropod Helix terrestris, crawling on the extended foot or pedium.

ness, weakness, (μαλακός, soft, weak.) In pathol., softening of the stomach, arising in some cases from post-mortem digestion, but sometimes existing during life.

gastromancy (gas'trō-mān-si), n. [Gr. gastromanteia, Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + μαντεία, divination. Cf. γαστρομαντεία, divine by the belly.] In antiq.: (a) A kind of divination among the ancients by means of words which seemed to be uttered from the belly; divination by ventriloquism. (b) A species of divination by means of large-bellied glasses or other round transparent vessels, in the center of which figures were supposed to appear by magic art.

gastromargue (gas'trō-mārg), n. [F., Gr. gastromargus or Gastromargus (Spix), an unused genus name, Gr. γαστρομαργός, gluttonous; see gastromargus.] A monkey of the genus Lagothrix. Geoffroy.

gastromyth (gas'trō-myth), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + μυθος, speak, Gr. μυθος, word, speech; see myth.] One whose voice appears to come from the belly; a ventriloquist. Blount.

gastronome (gas'trō-nōm), n. [F., gastronome = Fr. It. gastronomo; see gastronomy.] Same as gastronomer.

The happy gastronome may wash it down with a selection of thirty wines from Burgundy to Tokay. L. P. Simpson.

gastronomer (gas'trō-nōm-ēr), n. [Gr. gastrōnomy + -er; Cf. astronomer.] One versed in gastronomy; one who is a judge of good living; a judge of the art of cookery; a gourmet; an epicure.

The Roman Apicius, one of the three gastronomers of that name, devised a sort of cakes which were termed Apicians. Amer. Cyc., V, 285.

gastronomic, gastronomical (gas'trō-nōm-ik, -i-kəl), a. [Gr. gastrōnomy + -ic.] Pertaining to gastronomy.

gastronomist (gas'trō-nōm-ist), n. [Gr. gastrōnomy + -ist.] Same as gastronomer.

I was glad to have an opportunity of dining with so renowned a gastronomist. Hubner, Pelham.

gastronomy (gas'trō-nō-mi), n. [F., gastronomie = Sp. gastronomía = Fr. It. gastronomia, Gr. γαστρονομία, another title given to the work of Archestratus called γαστρονομία (see gastrology). Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + νομία, regulate, Gr. νόμος, rule, law.] The art of preparing and serving rich or delicate and appetizing food; hence, the pleasures of the table; epicurism.

Those incomparable men, who, retiring from a sinful world, gave themselves with undivided zeal to the profound science of gastronomy. Hubner, Pelham.

gastronosos (gas'trō-nō-sos), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + νόσος, disease.] In pathol., disease of the stomach.

Gastropacha (gas'trō-pā-cha), n. [NL. (Ochsenheimer, 1816), irreg. Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πάχος, thick.] A genus of bonyed moths having somewhat dentate wings, stout body, long palpi, and short antennae. The species occur rarely in North and South America, are commonly in Europe, and especially in Asia, one is also Australian. Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πάχος, thick.

Gastropacha, a small butterfly.

gastroparalysis (gas'trō-pā-rī-lī-sis), n. [NL. (Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + παράλυσις, paralysis.) In pathol., paralysis of the stomach.

gastroparietal (gas'trō-pā-rī-ē-tal), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πάρησις (parietis), wall; see parietes, parietal.] Of or pertaining to the stomach or the alimentary canal and the parietes or walls of the cavity in which it is situated. Gastroparietal band, in F. a. kinopoda and P. fusus a kind of mesenteric which extends from the midgut to the parietes of the coeloma, forming a partition in the coelomatic cavity. In Polydora, also called the mesenteric. See cut under Phoronella.

gastropathic (gas'trō-pā-thik), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πάθος, suffering.] In pathol., disease of the stomach.

gastropathy (gas'trō-pā-thi), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πάθος, suffering.] In pathol., disease of the stomach.

Gastrophilus, n. See Gasterophilus.

Gastrophrenic (gas'trō-frē-nik), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + φρην, the diaphragm.] Pertaining to the stomach and the diaphragm: applied to a fold of the peritoneum between these organs.

Gastrophysoma (gas'trō-fi-sē-mā), n. [NL. (Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + φύσις, a breath, a bubble, Gr. φυσή, blow, breathe.) A supposed genus of physcianian chalk-sponges, related to Haliphysma, but having several chambers. According to Haeckel (1876), these sponges are very near the archetypal gastrula in structure. It is really a foraminiferous form, not a sponge at all. See sponge.

Gastropneumonic (gas'trō-nū-mō-nik), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πνεύμων, the lungs.] Pertaining to the stomach and the lungs: applied to the continuous mucous membrane of the digestive and respiratory tracts.

Gastropod, Gastropoda, etc. See gastropod, etc.

gastropore (gas'trō-pōr), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + πόρος, pore.] The pore or orifice of a gastrozoid or nutritive polypite. Moseley, 1881.

gastrorrhagia (gas'trō-rā-gi-a), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + ῥαγή, a break.] In pathol., hemorrhage from the stomach.

gastrorrhaphy (gas'trō-rā-fī), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + ῥαφή, a suture, Gr. ῥαφίον, suture.] In surg., the operation of sewing up wounds of the abdomen.

gastrorrhea, gastrorrhoea (gas'trō-rē-ā), n. [NL., gastrorrhœa, (Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + ῥοή, a flow, Gr. ῥέω, flow.) In pathol., a morbid increase in the secretion of the mucous glands of the stomach.

gastroscopic (gas'trō-skōp-ik), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + σκοπέω, look after.]

gastroscopy (gas'trō-skō-pi), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + σκοπία, look after.]

In med., an examination of the abdomen in order to detect disease.

gastrospenic (gas'trō-spē-nik), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + σπλήν, the spleen.] Pertaining to the stomach and the spleen. Gastrospenic ligament or omentum, the fold of peritoneum by which the spleen is attached to the stomach.

gastrostegal (gas'trō-stē-gal), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + στέγα, covering.] Covering the belly, as the ventral scutes of a snake; pertaining to the gastrosteges.

gastrostegæ (gas'trō-stē-j), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + στέγα, a roof.] One of the scales or scutes which cover the abdomen of a snake from the head to the tail; an abdominal scute or scutellum. Snake scutellum have on the belly many small scales like those of the back and sides, being usually furnished instead with short, wide, transverse gastrosteges which reach from side to side and are imbricated, the hind edge of one overlapping the fore edge of the next succeeding. By muscular action when the snake is wriggling the whole series of gastrosteges stand somewhat on edge, so that their sharp hind borders catch on the slightest inequality of the surface, over which the snake thus glides as if pushed along by numberless little feet. That such is the action of the gastrosteges may be inferred from the ineffectual writhing of a snake when placed on a perfectly smooth surface, as a plate of glass. The last gastrostegæ, technically called the peroneal or postabdominal, is usually bald, or otherwise modified. Sentes somewhat like gastrosteges cover the under side of the tail, and are known as urosteges. See urostegæ.

gastrostomize (gas'trō-stō-mī-z), v. t.; pret. and pp. gastrostomized, ppr. gastrostomizing. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + στόμα, the mouth.] In surg., to subject to the operation of gastrotomy.

Gastrostomus (gas'trō-stō-mus), n. [NL. (Gill and Ryder, 1883), Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + στόμα, mouth.] A genus of deep-sea fishes, of the order Igneri and family Eurypharyngidae, having an eel-like form and enormously developed jaws, six or seven times as long as the rest of the skull, supporting a great gular pouch like a pelican's. The type species is named G. bairdii. It is an inhabitant of the deep sea, and has as yet been found only in the north Atlantic, near the American coast.

gastrostomy (gas'trō-tō-mi), n. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + στόμα, mouth.] In surg., the operation of forming an artificial opening into the stomach, for introducing food when it cannot pass through the gullet, on account of obstruction or stricture.

gastrostomic (gas'trō-tō-mik), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + στόμα, mouth.] Pertaining to gastrostomy.

Gastrostomy (gas'trō-tō-mi), n. [F., gastrostomie, Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + τομή, a cutting.] In surg.: (a) The operation of cutting into the stomach. (b) Laparotomy.

Gastrotricha (gas'trō-trī-ka), n. pl. [NL. (Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + τρίχης (trichis), hair.) An order of worm-like organisms formed by Metchnikoff for the reception of Ichthyodinium, a genus by some referred to the Rotifera; so called from the ciliated ventral surface. See Echinodermata, Chaetognathus. The group is still very imperfectly known. By some it is made a class of animals and placed between Rotifera and Femaloides. Also Gasterotricha.

gastrotrichous (gas'trō-trī-ku-s), a. [Gr. gastrōtricha + -ous.] Having the ventral surface ciliated; specifically, having the characters of the Gastrotricha.

gastrovascular (gas'trō-vā-skū-lār), a. [Gr. gastrō (gastrō), stomach, + Λ. vasculum, a little vessel; see vascular.] Common to or serving alike for the functions of digestion and circulation, as the body-cavity of some animals, or pertaining to the organs concerned in these processes.

Sagitta is temporarily celerate, but the two gastrovascular sacs, each enclosing an enterocoele, become shut off from the alimentary canal and metamorphosed into the walls of the perivisceral cavity.

Gastrovascular canal, a connection or communication between the enteric cavity proper and some part of the body-cavity.

In many invertebrates, one or more diverticula of the archenteron extend into the pericenteron and its contained mesoblast. Sometimes, as in the Ctenostomata, these remain connected with the alimentary cavity throughout life, and are termed gastrovascular canals.

Huxley, Encyc. Brit., II, 52.

Gastrovascular space, a gastrovascular body-cavity. Radially symmetrical animals with a body composed of cells. They have a body cavity which serves alike for circulation and digestion (gastrovascular space).

Clara Zoology (trans.), p. 202.

Gastrovascular system, in Ascidia, see the extract.

The principal digestive cavity (of Ascidia) seldom remains single, but grows out into secondary cavities, which have the character of pouches, or of canals. These necessary spaces of the digestive cavity, included with the latter under the designation gastrovascular system, undertake the function of a circulatory system, without being morphologically anything else than the differentiations of a primitive enteric cavity.

Gravenhorst, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 114.

gastrula (gas'trō-lā), n.; pl. gastrulae (-læ). [NL., dim. of L. gaster, Gr. gastrō (gastrō), belly, stomach; see gaster.] In embryol., that form of the germ of the Metazoa which is a germ-cup of which the walls consist of two layers.

Gastrula of a Chalk sponge (Sycon). A, external view. B, longitudinal section through the axis: a, primitive intestine; b, primitive intestine; c, blastopore or primitive mouth opening; d, inner cell-layer of the body wall; e, outer germ layer, hypoblast; f, endoblast, or intestinal layer; g, outer cell layer (the outer germ-layer, epiblast, ectoderm, or skin layer). (From Haeckel's "Evolution of Man".)

It is the result of that process of invagination which occurs in most animals whereby a vesicular morula, blastosphere or blastula is converted into a cup-like two-layered germ, with a blastopore or orifice of invagination, and an endoderm or membrane enclosing a primitive intestinal cavity, the endoderm itself being included within an ectoderm. The word enters into many loose compounds of obvious meaning, as gastrula body, cup, form, formation, germ, mouth, stage, stomach, etc., mostly derived from the translation of the German compounds used in Haeckel's works. See gastrotrichia.

The stage of embryonic development in which the cellular wall consists of two layers of cells is called by Haeckel the "gastrula stage." L. P. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., I, 388.

The gastrula seems to me the most important and significant germ form of the animal kingdom.

Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I, 192.

gastrular (gas'trō-lār), a. [Gr. gastrula + -ar.] Pertaining to a gastrula or to gastrulation; as, a gastrular invagination.

gastrulation (gas'trō-lā-shon), n. [Gr. gastrula + -ation.] In embryol., the formation of a gastrula; the process whereby a germ is converted from a morula or a blastula into a gastrula. In most animal gastrulation consists in the invagination of the blastula, and succeeds blastulation; in some, as mammals, Gastrulation, following segmentation of the blastula or Fertilization cleavage of three kinds of blastulae: (1) or those which undergo total cleavage, seen in porpenterula; (2) non-section through median plane of primitive intestinal cavity; (3) outer of ectodermic or endodermic cells (skin-layer), light; (4) inner or hypoblastic or endodermic cells (intestinal layer), dark. (No nutritive yolk in these eggs; none advanced enough to show any mesodermic cells, i. e., mesoderm.) In all, as letters mark same parts: a, the egg, ovum, or germ cell; b, cleavage-cells, blastomeres, or segmentella; c, mulberry-germ or morula; d, vesicular germ or blastula; e, germ-upon or gastrula; f, cleavage-cavity, blastocoele, or hollow of blastulation; g, primitive intestinal cavity, archenteron, or hollow of gastrulation; h, primitive mouth, archenteron, or blastopore. Figs. 1-6. Fertilized egg, and primitive gastrulation cleavage of the present true vertebrate. Brachyotomus, resulting in a polytrophic or totipotent gastrula. 1, a gastrula (archenteron); 2, cleavage stage of a cell; 3, morula (archenteron); 4, many cells; 5, blastula (archenteron); 6, same undergoing gastrulation by invagination, or embryonic gastrulation (archenteron). Figs. 7-12. Total but unequal egg cleavage of an amphibian, frog, resulting in a modified or hood gastrula. 7, cytotrophic gastrula; 8, cleavage stage of a cell; 9, morula (archenteron); 10, already in process of blastulation; 11, blastula (archenteron); 12, gastrula (archenteron). To be but unequal egg cleavage of a mammal (woman), resulting in a modified or hood gastrula. 13, cytotrophic gastrula; 14, cleavage stage of a cell; 15, same of a cell; 16, morula (archenteron); 17, gastrulation without actual blastulation; 18, gastrulation for the advanced (archenteron) corresponding to the blastula of fig. 4, 5, and 10; 19, gastrulation complete (used to be followed, and preceded as in the other cases, by blastulation, or the formation of a blastocoele vesicle). (From Haeckel's "Evolution of Man.") a kind of gastrulation ensues directly upon morulation, and therefore precedes blastulation.

gastrostomus (gas'trō'stōm), n. [Gr. gaster (gastēr), stomach, + stōma, tail, + -ia, -an.] One of the stomatopodous crustaceans.

Gastus (gas'tus), n. [NL. (Meigen), Gr. gaster (gastēr), stomach: see gaster 2.] Same as Gasterophilus.

gas-washer (gas'wosh'ēr), n. In gas-making, an apparatus into which the gas in process of purification is passed from the condenser, and which is designed to free the gas from ammonia. Several forms of washer have been in use, the essential principle of all being the bringing of every particle of the gas into intimate contact with water, for which ammonia has a strong affinity. The gas passes from the washer to the gas-purifier. See also scrubber.

gas-water (gas'wā'tēr), n. Water through which coal-gas has been passed, and which has absorbed the impurities of the gas. It is impregnated with sulphide and ammoniacal salts.

gas-well (gas'wel), n. A well or boring from which natural gas escapes persistently and in considerable quantity. Some borings in western Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio discharge gas enough to be of value for heating and illuminating purposes. See natural gas, under gas.

Practically all the large gas wells struck before 1882 were accidentally discovered in boring for oil. Science, V, 521.

gas-works (gas'wōrks), n. sing. and pl. An establishment in which illuminating gas is manufactured, and whence it is distributed by pipes to points of consumption.

gat (gat), n. An old preterit of get.

gatch (gach), n. An obsolete form of goat.

gatch (gach), n. [Pers. gach, Hind. gach, plaster, mortar.] Plaster as used in Persian gatch-work.

By the aid of gatch or plaster of Paris, the artisan of Teheran often transforms these mud structures into dreams of loveliness. S. G. W. Benjamin, The Century, XXXII, 719.

gatch-decoration (gach'dek'ō-rā'shon), n. In Eastern art, especially Persian, decoration in molded plaster, by which means designs of great boldness can be carried out, even in inexpensive work.

gatchers (gach'ērs), n. pl. [Origin obscure.] In mining, after-leavings of tin. Wcale.
gatch-work (gach'wōrk), n. Work done with gatch; collectively, things produced with gatch-decoration.

gate (gāt), n. [ME. gate, gat, more commonly with initial palatal, gate, gat, geat, get, gate, ghate (> mod. E. dial. gate, Sc. also get, gett), < AS. geat (pl. geats, gats), a gate, door (= OS. gat, a hole (applied to a needle's eye), = OFries. gat, jet, a hole, opening (as a breach in a dike), = D. gat, a hole, opening, gap, mouth, = MLG. LG. gat, a hole, opening, = Lecl. gat (pl. gāt), a hole (of comp. skär-gat, a keyhole, luka-gat, a trap-door), = Norw. gat, a hole, esp. a small hole made by a knife, a notch, groove (> gata, out a hole, pierce with a knife, esp. of making buttonholes, = Lecl. gata, bore (Haldorson), = Dan. gat, a hole, a narrow inlet; perhaps < AS. gitan (prot. geat), get, reach: see get. Gate is usually confused with gate 2, a way, street, etc., or, if distinguished from it etymologically, referred to the same ult. root; but the words are prob. radically different. Gate is not represented in HG. or Goth., while, on the other hand, gate 2 is peculiar to these branches, with the Scand., and does not belong originally to any of the LG. tongues. 1. A passage or opening closed by a movable barrier (a door or gate in sense 3); a gateway: commonly used with reference to such barrier, and specifically for the entrance to a large inclosure or building, as a walled city, a fortification, a great church or palace, or other public monument.

And Samson . . . took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, but all Judah xvi 8

Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land Prov. xxi, 23

All the princes of the King of Babylon came in and sat in the middle gate. Jer. xxxix, 3

2. Hence, any somewhat contracted or difficult means or avenue of approach or passage; a narrow opening or defile: as, the Iron Gates of the Danube.

And in the pouches of mine ear did pour The leperous distillment, whose effect Holds such an unity with blood of man That, swift as quicksilver, it courses through The natural gates and alleys of the body. Shak. Hamlet, I, 5.

3. A movable barrier consisting of a frame or solid structure of wood, iron, or other material, set on hinges or pivots in or at the end of a passage in order to close it. Specifically: (a) A swinging frame, usually of openwork, closing a passage through an inclosing wall or fence. In this use distinguished from door, which is usually a solid frame closing a passage to a house or room. (b) A fixed barrier closing the entrance to a fortification or other large building, as a factory, designed for the passage of vehicles, masses of persons, etc. equivalent to door, but rarely so used except with reference to a door of great size or elaborate construction, as the entrance doors of a cathedral.

Thursday, that was the xxiiij day of June, a bowth x or 13 of the cloke, the Gates of the holy Temple of the Sepulchre was sett open And thence we went all to the Mount Sion to Dyer. Torkington, Diary of Eng. Travels, p. 15.

Open the temple gates unto us here Open them wide that she may enter in Spenser, Epithalamion, l. 204

(c) The movable framework which shuts or opens a passage for water, as at the entrance to a dock or in a canal lock.

4. In coal-mining, an underground road connecting a stall with a main road or inclined plane. Also called gate road, gateway. [Eng.]

5. In founding: (a) One of various forms of channels or openings made in the sand or molds, through which the metal flows (pouring gate), or by means of which access is had to it, either for skimming its surface (skimming-gate) or for other purposes. (b) The waste piece of metal cast in the gate. (c) A ridge in a casting which has to be sawn off. — 6. In book-binding, one of the apertures in the tumbler for the passage of the stub. E. H. Knight. — 7. A wash or frame in which a saw is extended, to prevent bucking or bending. Cilician Gates. See Cilician. — Gate of justice, a gate, used of a temple, etc., at which a sovereign or judge sat to receive complaints and administer justice. In some places, in observance of this custom, special structures following the general form of gates may have been erected to receive the throng of the judiciary. In the early middle ages, in various regions of Europe, as in southern France and in Italy, it was the custom for the king or the feudal lord to administer justice seated at the gates of the chief church; whence the expressions, with reference to judicial sentences, "at the gates," or "at the door" in allusion to the sculptured lions with which the church-gates were commonly adorned, as at the cathedral of St. Trophimus in Arles. Compare Sabbins Porta, under Porta.

Nor can it be doubted that this [a ruin at Persepolis] is one of those buildings so frequently mentioned in the Bible as a gate, not the door of a city or building, but a gate of justice, such as that where Mordecai sat at Susa. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I, 193.

Gates of death. See death's door, under death. — Ivory gate, in poetical imagery, the semi-transparent gate of the house of Sleep, through which dreams appear distorted so as to assume flattering but delusive forms. The other gate is of transparent horn, through which true visions are seen by the dreamer. The allusion is to a legend in Greek mythology.

Two gates the silent house of Sleep adorn,
Of polished ivory this, that of transparent horn:
True visions through transparent horn arise;
Through polished ivory pass deluding lies. Dryden, Amiel, vi.

Let it suffice me that my murmuring rhyme
Beats with light wing against the ivory gate, Telling a tale not too importunate
To those who in that sleepy region stay. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I, Apol.

The angelic door or gate. See door. — The beautiful gates, royal gates, silver gates. See the royal doors, under door. To break gates, in English universities, as Cambridge and Oxford, to enter college after the hour to which a student has been restricted — a serious offence. See gate, c. 2. To stand in the gate or gates, in Scot., to occupy a position of advantage or defense.

Stand in the gate of the Lord's house, and proclaim there this word. Jer. vii, 2.

gate (gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. gated, ppr. gating. [< gate 1, n.] 1. To supply with a gate. — 2. In the English universities of Oxford and Cambridge, to punish by a restriction on customary liberty. An undergraduate may be gated for a breach of college discipline either by having to be within his college gates by a certain hour, or by being denied liberty to go beyond the gates.

The dean gave him a book of Virgil to write out, and gated him for a fortnight after hall. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, xli.

gate (gāt), n. (Also, and in the particular sense 'manner of walking, walk,' now usually spelled gait, but prop. gate, < ME. gate (never with initial g, y, being of Scand. origin), a way, road; fig., in certain adverbial phrases, way, manner (as in what gate, in what manner, other gate or other gates, in other manner (see another-gates), no gates, in no wise, alle gate, aligates, always, at all events (see aligat), thus gate, thus gates, in this manner, thus, no gate, no gates, in such manner, so, how gates, how, etc.); < Lecl. gata, a way, path, road (in phrase alla gata, aligates, always, throughout), = Norw. gata, a road, path, driveway, street, = Sw. gata, a street, lane, = Dan. gade, a street, = OHG. gaza, MLG. gasse, G. gasse, a street, = Goth. gata, a street. Usually confused with gate 1, a door, but the connection, if any, is remote: see gate 1. A popular association with go (See go) has given special prominence to the particular sense 3, 'manner of walking, walk,' with senses thence derived, usually spelled gait; but there is no etymological connection with go. 1. A way; road; path; course. [Now chiefly Scotch, and also spelled gait.]

Thou canst [knowest] ful wel the rihte [right] gate To Lincoln Chaucer, l. 540.

Alle togheð flechhand [as flying fowl] . . . Of whose gate no man may no trace fynd. Hampole, Prick of Conscience, l. 707b.

I was going to be an honest man, but the devil has this very day bung first a lawyer, and then a woman, in my gate. Scott.

I used a waulf' gate yestreen,
A gate, I fear, I'll sadly run.
Thence, I gae'd a waulf' gate yestreen.

(In this sense it is common in names of streets, as High-gate, Bishopsgate, Callowgate, Kirkgate, etc., where gate is often understood to represent gate, a door or entrance.) 2. Way; manner; mode of doing; used especially with all, this, thus, other, no, etc., in adverbial phrases. [Now only Scotch.]

Sule ye thus gate fra no fle? Hurdak, l. 2419.

Some other gates was he dight,
But in this gait [gait] skyname Kir Perceval, l. 633 (Thomson Rom., ed. Halliwell).

One wa, bot; dinnu blaw in folk's lugs that gate. Scott, Redgauntlet, letter vii.

In particular — 3t. Way or manner of walking; walk; carriage. [In this use now spelled gait, and usually associated (erroneously) with the verb go. See the etymology, and gait.] — 4t. Movement on a course or way; progress; procession; journey; expedition.

Thou schilt Gawine the Gay
Fratt for the journey,
That he might furth wend.
The king grantit the gait to Mohir Gawayne. Osman and Golegry, III, 12.

She to her wagon clombe; clombe all the rest,
And forth together went with sorrow fraught; . . .
And all the grisly Monstrers of the Rec Stood gaping at their gate, and wondred them to see.
Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 32.

5f. Room or opportunity for going forward; space to move in.

Here, ye goddess, gave a token gaffe vs gate,
We muste steppe to yone steere of a state.
York Plays, p. 279.

Nae gait, nowhere, in no direction or place. [Scotch.]
Was were the hoarts in merray Carillale,
For she was nae gait found.
Child Ballads (Child's Ballads, I. 246).

I hold him in my dreams

Gaunt as it were the skeleton of himself,

Death-pale, for lack of gentle maiden's aid.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine

2. Characterized by or producing emaciation; famishing; attenuating, as, gaunt poverty.

The metropolis of the Republic was captured, while gaunt distress raged every where within our borders.

Sumner, Orations, I, 123.

gaunt³ (gānt or gānt), n. The great crested grebe or cargoose, Podiceps cristatus.

gaunteri, n. [ME. & OF. gaunter, a glove, < gant, a glove, see gauntlet.] A glove. York Plays, Index, p. lxxvi.

gauntlet¹ (gānt'let or gānt'let), n. [Also gauntlet; < OF. gauntlet, dim. of gant. E. gant, a glove, = It. gaunt, a glove, < ML. wantus, the long sleeve of a tunic, a gauntlet, glove, < D. want, a mitten, = Dan. want, a mitten, = OSw. want, a glove, = low. vott for vant, a glove.] 1. A glove; specifically, in medieval armor, a glove of defense, either attached to the defensive armor of the arm or separate from it.

Throughout the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the sleeve of the hauberk was long, and closed at the end covering the hands in the form of mittens; a glove of leather was worn beneath the mail to protect the hand from the chafing of the metal rings. Toward the end of the thirteenth century a slit was made at the palm, through which the hand could be passed, allowing the mail mitten to hang from the wrist. A few instances of mail gauntlets with separated fingers appear in English monuments of the same period. In the fourteenth century the separate armed glove appears, consisting at first of leather upon which roundels and other plates of steel are sewed; and about 1380 is found the completely articulated glove of hammered steel, each finger separate and each joint free to bend. The changes after this are merely in the direction of greater delicacy of execution, allowing still freer movement. In tournaments and jousts the left hand was sometimes guarded by a heavy steel glove without joints. See main-defer. Also called glove of mail.

A. Gauntlet of plate, early 14th century. B. Gauntlet of plate, later 14th century. C. Gauntlet of plate, 15th century. D. Gauntlet of plate, 16th century. E. Gauntlet of plate, 17th century. F. Gauntlet of plate, 18th century. G. Gauntlet of plate, 19th century. H. Gauntlet of plate, 20th century.

The hands, the spear that lately grasped, Still in the mailed gauntlet clasped, Were interchanged in greeting dear.

Scott, L. of L. M., v, 6.

2. A long stout glove, usually for use in riding or driving. As ordinarily worn, it covers loosely the lower part of the arm.

I, in fur cap, gauntlets, and overcoat, took my station a little way back in the circle of the light.

The Century, XXXVI, 47.

3. In a restricted sense, the wrist-cover or cuff alone of a glove.

Thick white wash leather gloves with gauntlets worn by the life guards.

D. C. of New York

4. A mitt. — 5. In surp., a form of bundage which envelops the hand and fingers like a glove. Closed gauntlet. See closed. To cast or throw down the gauntlet, vt. To cast one's glove upon the ground in token of challenge or defiance. A custom of medieval times.

At the second course came into the hall Sir Richard Denoche the kynge his champion, to make a proclamation, that whosoever would say that kynge Richard was not lawfully kynge, he would fight with him at the XT terrace, and throw down his gauntlet, and then at the hal cried kynge Richard.

Har. Rich. III., an.

As if of purpose he [Cromwell] led in challenge of the World cast down the Gauntlet for the War.

Punch, Pilgrimage, p. 66.

Hence, in general, (b) To challenge, invite opposition with the view of overcoming it.

The duke had by this assertion of his intentions thrown down the gauntlet.

Stables, Cont., II, 13.

To take up the gauntlet, vt. To accept a challenge by lifting from the ground another's gauntlet thrown down in defiance. Hence, in general, (c) To assume the defensive; take up the defense of a person, opinion, etc., that has been attacked or impugned.

I shall make no scruple to take up the challenge to be the challenge both of him and all his party to take up the Gauntlet, though a kings in the behalf of Liberty and the common wealth.

Milton, Areopagitica, Pref.

Every man is not a proper champion for truth, nor fit to take up the gauntlet in the cause of verity.

Sir I. Browne, Religio Medici, I, 11.

gauntlet² (gānt'let), n. Same as gauntlet¹, 1.

gauntleted, gauntletted (gānt'let or gānt'let), a. 1. Wearing a gauntlet.

Be wary, madam, said Undress, and smothering hold of the Queens arm with his own gauntleted hand, he pressed it in the tenderness of his passion more closely perhaps than he was himself aware of.

Scott, Robt. Bruce, I, 275.

The two Gaunt Brothers began to feel for their swords and shake their gauntleted fists at one another.

Long, Isaac, I, 375.

2. Provided with a gauntlet, as, a gauntleted glove.

gauntlet-guard (gānt'let-gārd), n. A guard of a sword or dagger, so formed as to protect the hand very completely or in an unusual way. See patih.

gauntlet-pipe (gānt'let-pīp), n. A tobacco pipe marked with a gauntlet or glove on the bowl or stem—that is, on the bottom of the bowl, where the stem is attached. These originally so marked were supposed to be superior, and the gauntlet mark of the first maker was imitated by others.

gauntlet-shield (gānt'let-shēld), n. Same as glove-shield.

gauntlet-sword (gānt'let-sōrd), n. A sword furnished with a gauntlet-guard. See patih.

gauntleted, a. See gauntleted.

gauntly (gānt'li or gānt'li), adv. Leanly; meagerly; haggardly.

gauntness (gānt'nes or gānt'nes), n. The condition of being gaunt.

I know him by his gauntness, by that chattering.

Middleton, Four Temple Masque

gauntree, gauntry (gān'tree, trī, n. t. pl. gauntrees, gauntrees), n. [Also gauntry, gauntree; < gaunt², a tub, a gallon measure, + tree, a wooden support; see gaunt² and tree.] The E. chanter, a wood-yard, stock, gauntree, skilling stool (< L. cantherius, a tallis, is a different word.) 1. A frame made to support a barrel or cask in a horizontal position with the bung uppermost.

Fell keenly to the work.

To save the water, out of the hole.

Emerson, Christ's Kirk, II.

2. A frame or scaffolding which supports a crane or other structure. L. H. Knight.

Upon the top of all comes the main deck furnished with gauntrees, cranes, oil heated by furnaces, &c.

Nature, XXVI, 375.

Also spelled gauntree.

Traveling gauntree, a movable platform.

gaup, v. t. See gaup.

gaupus (gā'pus), n. [A dial. var. of gabby, gaby.] A gabby; a chattering. [Prov. Eng.]

The great gaupus never seed that I were japeing in the same places twice over.

Mrs. Gaskell, Ruth, xvi.

gaurl¹, v. t. [ME. gauron, regarded as repr. mod. E. gare; see gar¹.] Same as gar¹.

gaurl² (gaur), n. [The native E. Ind. name, < Skt. gaurā.] A large wild ox of India, Bubalus gaurus, the wild stock of the domesticated gayal, and related to the zebu. It inhabits the jungles of Assam, of Cuttack in the Madras Presidency, and of the Central Provinces. It has a broad protuberant forehead, short central horns very thick at the base, high shoulders, and a long tail bushy at the end. The color is dark, with the white legs which also characterize the gayal. The hide is very thick, and is valued as a material for shields. The gaur is not known in the domesticated state, the animal which has been reclaimed being a modified variety. See pagal. Also written gaur.

The Major has stuck many a pig, shot many a gaur, rhinoceros, and elephant.

Kingsley, Two Years Ago, xviii.

To a casual observer there may appear no difference between the gaurus (the gaur) and the frontalis (the gaur) but a careful inspection shows the formation of the skull and horns to differ, besides which the gaur is the larger animal.

Proc. Zool. Soc., London, 1889, p. 143.

Gaura (gā'rā), n. [NL.] An ungraceous genus of erect herbs of the United States and northern Mexico, bearing wand-like spikes or racemes of white or pink flowers. There are 15 or 20 species, of which the Texan, G. Lindheimeri, is frequent in cultivation.

gausie, a. See gausie.

gauss (gous), n. [Named after Karl Friedrich Gauss (1777–1855), a German mathematician, noted especially for his magnetic researches and inventions.] A unit used to measure the intensity of a magnetic field. It is the intensity produced by a magnetic pole of unit strength (sometimes called a unit pole) at a distance of one centimeter.

Gaussian (gou'si-an), a. [< Gauss (see gauss), + -ian.] Pertaining to the mathematician Karl Friedrich Gauss, or to his discoveries.

Gaussian logarithms, logarithms so arranged as to give the logarithms of the sum and difference of numbers whose logarithms are given.

Gaussian logarithms are intended to facilitate the finding of the logarithm of the sum and difference of two numbers whose logarithms are known, the numbers themselves being unknown, and on this account they are frequently called addition and subtraction logarithms.

Lange, Math., XIV, 777.

Gaussian method of approximate integration, a method of integration in which the value of the variable for which those of the function are given are supposed to be chosen at the most advantageous intervals. Gaussian period, a period of convenient length in the division of a circle. Gaussian series, a series studied by Gauss, in which the quotient of the $(n+1)$ th term by the $(n+1)$ th

$$\frac{(n+1)(n+1)(n+1)}{(n+1)(n+1)(n+1)}$$

while the first term is unity—commonly called the hypergeometric series. Gaussian sum, a sum of terms the logarithm of which is the square of the ordinal number of the term multiplied by 2π . It thus is a rational constant, the same for all the terms. Gaussian or Gauss's analogies or equations, the following formulae of spherical trigonometry, where the capital letters are the angles of a spherical triangle and the corresponding small letters the opposite sides:

$$\begin{aligned} \sin A \cos a &= \sin B \cos b = \sin C \cos c \\ \sin A \sin a &= \sin B \sin b = \sin C \sin c \\ \cos A &= \frac{\cos a \cos b \sin C + \sin a \sin b \cos C}{\sin c} \\ \cos B &= \frac{\cos b \cos a \sin C + \sin b \sin a \cos C}{\sin c} \\ \cos C &= \frac{\cos c \cos a \sin B + \sin c \sin a \cos B}{\sin b} \end{aligned}$$

Gaussian or Gauss's formula, function, theorem, etc. See the nouns Gaussian or Gauss's rule for finding the date of Easter.

gauf (gāf), n. Same as ghaf.

gauch (gāch), n. [Origin obscure.] The oval resulting from cutting and opening scallops.

[Local, U. S.]

gauton (gā'ton), n. [Origin obscure.] In cutting, a narrow channel cut in the floor of an underground roadway for purposes of drainage.

gauze (gāz), n. and a. [Formerly also gauz, gauze; < E. gauz, cushion canvas, tiffany (< Cot. gauze), gauze, = Sp. gaza = NGr. γαζα, gauze; cf. ML. gazatum, gauze. Said to be so called from Gaza in Syria (cf. ML. gazatum, wine from Gaza), but the statement arose from a mere conjecture of Du Cange, and rests on no evidence except the similarity of the words and the fact that some eastern fabrics are named from the places of their origin, as calico, cambale, damask, holland, nankeen, etc.] The word is, however, perhaps of Eastern origin; cf. Hind. gauz, thin, coarse cotton cloth. The Hind. gāchh, gāch, gauze is from the L. word.] 1. n. 1. A very thin, slight, transparent stuff made of silk, cotton, and rayon, or silk and hemp or linen. It is often printed or dyed with patterns in silk, or, in the case of gauze, from the east of Asia, with flowers in gold or silver.

By a web and does like and thibbles and gauzes, Are by Robert Boyle lately brought over,

With forty things more.

Sheff., An Excellent New Song.

A veil, that seemed no more than glided air,
Flying by each fine ear, an Eastern gauze
With words of gold. Tennyson, Lover's Tale, iv.

Perhaps there are people who do see their own lives, even in moments of excitement, through this embroidered gauze of life's future and art.

A. Lang, Contemporary Rev., L.IV. 817.

2. Any slight open material resembling this fabric: as, wire gauze. Empress gauze. See Empress. Lister's gauze, gauze impregnated with carbolic acid, used as an antiseptic dressing. Wire gauze, wire cloth in which the wire is fine and the meshes very small.

II. a. Of or like gauze; gauzy.

In another case, we see a white, smooth, soft worm turned into a black, hard crustaceous beetle with gauzy wings. Fallen, Nat. Theol., xix.

Gauze flannel. See flannel. Gauze point-lace, lace which has a ground of plain net, especially of machine-made net, of perfectly regular pattern. Gauze ribbon, a ribbon made of fine silk muslin.

gauze-dresser (gā'z' dres'er), n. One whose occupation is the stiffening of gauze.

gauze-tree (gā'z' trē), n. The lace-bark tree of Jamaica, Lagetta linearis.

gauze-winged (gā'z' wingd), a. Having gauzy wings: applied to sundry insects, as May-flies.

gauziness (gā'z' i-nēs), n. [< gauzy + -ness.] The quality of being gauzy; gauzy texture or appearance.

In drawing any stuffs, blindings of books or other finely textured substances, do not trouble yourself, as yet, much about the wooliness or gauziness of the thing, but get it right in shade and fold and true in pattern. Ruskin, Elem. of Drawing, p. 64.

gauzy (gā'z'i), a. [< gauze + -y.] Like gauze; thin as gauze.

The whole essay, however, is of a flimsy, gauzy texture. Forster, Essay.

The exquisite nautilus floated past us, with its gauzy sail set, looking like a thin sail out of a soap bubble. C. W. Stoddard, South Sea Idylls, p. 23.

savage (ga-vilz'), n. [< < gaver, gorge fowls, pigeons, etc., with food in order to fatten them, < gure, in popular speech the crop or craw of a bird, < Plead gure, throat, Wallon gaf, crop or craw.] 1. A system of fattening poultry for market by forcing them to swallow fixed quantities of food at stated intervals. The fowls are confined in small boxes in tiers one over another, the head being outward. The food consists of a semi fluid paste compounded according to various formulas, and it is forced into the mouths of the fowls through a flexible tube by means of a force pump.

2. In med., a similar method of forced feeding, employed under certain conditions.

Thanks to the convenience and garage, the time when the fowls becomes viable may now be placed in the seventh month. Medical News, L.II. 631.

gave (gav). Preterit of give.
gavel (gav'el), n. [*< ME. gavel, < AS. gafol, gafel, tribute, tax, appur. connected with gifu (pret. gaf), give, but prob. adapted from Celtic; cf. W. gafael = Corn. gavel, a hold, tenure, = Ir. gabhail, a taking, spoil, conquest, = Gael. gabhail, a taking, booty, conquest, < gabh, take, receive. Cf. gavelkind. The same word appears in Rom. languages, F. gabelle, etc., > E. gabel, q. v. Contr. gavel, q. v.] 1. In old Eng. law, rent; tribute; toll; custom; more specifically, rent payable otherwise than in feudal military service.—2. The tenure by which, according to either the ancient Saxon or Welsh custom, land on the death of the tenant did not go to the eldest son, but was partitioned in equal shares among all the sons, or among several members of the family in equal degree, or by which, according to the Irish custom, the death of a holder involved a general redistribution of the tribal lands. Compare gavelkind.*

In the case of the death of the chief of the tribe, or even of any one of the chieftains, the lands of all the sept were thrown into gavel and redistributed. Fortnighly Rev., N. S., XI. 193.

3. A partition made pursuant to such custom.

A gavel or partition was made (in Wales) on the death of every member of a family for three generations after which none could be enforced. Ballam, Const. Hist., III. 330.

gavel (gav'el), n. [*< OF. gavelle, later javelle = Pr. gavelle, mod. gavelle = Sp. gavilla = lg. gavela, a sheaf of corn; referred by Diez and others, prob. erroneously, to an assumed L. form capella, dim. of capulus, a handle, < capere, take; see capable.] 1. A sheaf of corn before it is tied up; a small heap of unbound wheat or other grain. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

As fields that have been long time chided With catching weather, when their corn lies on the gavel heap.
Are with a constant northwind dried. Chapman, Ilad, xli.

2. A small mallet used by the presiding officer of a legislative body or public assembly to attract attention and signal for order.

A handsome gavel, consisting of the bust of Hippocrates, admirably carved, was presented to the college. Medical News, L.II. 524.

gavel (gav'el), v. t. [*< OF. gaveler, javeler; from the noun.] To bind into sheaves. Colgrave.

gavel (gā'vel), n. A dialectal form of gable.
gaveled (gav'eld), a. [< gavel(-kind) + -ed.] In old Eng. law, held under the tenure of gavelkind; said of lands.

gaveler, gaveler (gav'el-er), n. [< gavel + -er.] In coal-mining, the agent of the crown having the power to grant gales to the free miners. See gale, 2. [Forest of Dean, Eng.]

gavelet (gav'el-et), n. [See gavel.] An ancient and special cessavit, in the English county of Kent, where the custom of gavelkind continues, by which the tenant, if he withdraws the rent and services due to his lord, forfeits his lands and tenements. See gavelkind.

gavelkind (gav'el-kind), n. [< Ir. gabhail-cine, gavelkind, < gabhail, a taking (a tenure), = Gael. gabhail, a taking, a lease, farm, = W. gafael = Corn. gavel, a hold, holding, tenure (see gavel), + Ir. cine, a race, tribe, family (cf. W. cenedl, a tribe).] 1. Originally, in old Eng. law, the tenure of land let out for rent, including in that term money, labor, and provisions, but not military service; also, the land so held. The most important incident of this tenure was that upon the death of the tenant all his sons inherited equal shares, if he left no sons, the daughters, if neither, then all his brothers inherited equal shares. When the feudal system introduced the law of primogeniture, the county of Kent and some other localities were privileged to retain this ancient custom of inheritance.

Miss Rossetti comes commended to our interest, not only as one of a family which seems to hold genius by the tenure of gavelkind, but as having a special claim by inheritance to a love and understanding of Dante. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 47.

Hence—2. In general use, land in Great Britain or Ireland, or an estate therein, which by custom having the force of law is inheritable by all the sons together, and therefore subject to partition, instead of going exclusively to the eldest. The word has been used in the following different senses, of which only the first and second are strictly correct: (a) soilage tenure in England before the Conquest (see soilage); (b) immemorial soilage tenure in the county of Kent, England; (c) the body of customs allowed on ancient soilage lands in Kent; (d) the customs of partible descent in Kent; (e) any custom of partition in any place. Elton, Irish gavelkind, the holding of a member of a sept which, by Irish custom, was not at his death divided among his sons, but was included in a redistribution of all the lands of the sept among the surviving members of the sept.

The landholders held their estates by an extraordinary tenure, that of Irish gavelkind. On the death of a proprietor, instead of an equal partition among his children, as in the gavelkind of English law, the chief of the sept made, or was entitled to make, a fresh division of all the lands within his district. Hallam, Const. Hist., III. 332.

gavella, n. See gaballa.

gaveller, n. See gaveller.

gavelman (gav'el-man), n.; pl. gavelmen (-men). [< gavel + man.] A tenant holding land in gavelkind.

gavelmed (gav'el-med), n. [AS. gafol-mæd, < gafol, ME. gavel, tribute, + mæd, ME. mede, E. mead, meadow; see gavel and mead.] In old Eng. law, the duty or work of mowing grass or cutting meadow-land, required by the superior from his customary tenants.

gavelock (gav'e-lok), n. [Also gufflock; < ME. gavelock, gavelok, a spear, javelin, < AS. gafeluc (once, in a gloss), a spear or javelin. Cf. MHG. gabilot, a javelin, F. javelot, It. giavelotto, and F. javelin, > E. javelin, q. v.; all of Celtic origin, from the same source as gaff and gable.] 1. A spear; a javelin.

I caught him launch at him knives and gavelocks and darts such as he seldom as it baidly reigned on him. Melville (E. E. T. S.) II. 30.

2. An iron crow or lever. [North. Eng.]

WF plough cutters and gavelocks

They made the jail-house door to fier.

Billie, Archie (Child's Ballads, VI. 25)

gaverick (gā'vēr-ik), n. [Origin obscure.] A name of the red gurnard, Trigla cuculus, a common fish on the coast of Cornwall in England. [Local, Eng.]

gavia (gā'vi-ā), n. [L., a bird, perhaps the sea-mew.] In ornith., a name variously used. (a) An old name of (1) some gull or gull-like bird, or (2) some plover or plover-like bird. (b) (comp.) A genus of gulls. Möckring, 1752; Brisson, 1760. (c) (comp.) Another genus of gulls—(1) same as Rissa (Boie, 1844), (2) same as Pagophila (Boie, 1825). The ivory gull, P. alba, is now often called Gavia alba. (d) (comp.) A genus of wading birds: a synonym of Anas. Strauss, 1827. (e) (comp.) A genus of lapwing-plovers: a synonym of Panellus. Geper, 1842. (f) The specific name of sundry water-birds. Also gavian, gavin, gabian, gabian, gavieta.

gavial (gā'vi-ā), n. [An adapted form (NL. gavialis) of what is otherwise written gharial, ghurial, < Hind. ghariyāl, a crocodile.] The Gangetic crocodile, Gavialis gangeticus, having long, slender, subcylindric jaws with a protuberance at the end of the upper one. It is one of the largest living crocodiles, sometimes attaining a length of 20 feet. The peculiar shape of the snout is a result of gradual modification, since it is broad and flattened in the young, and attains its highest development only in old males. The gavials swarm in some of the rivers of India, where they are objects of superstitious veneration. Also called nakas.

gavialid (gā'vi-ā'id), n. A crocodilian of the family Gavialidae.

Gavialidae (gā'vi-ā'id-ā), n. pl. [NL. < Gavialis + -idae.] The family of crocodiles of which the genus Gavialis is the type. It belongs to the group Proceras or Eusuchia of the order Crocodylia. It is characterized by the combination of a continuous series of plates on the head and back, and by lower teeth which are not included within the margin of the upper jaw when the mouth is closed.
